THE

SATURDAY EVENING POST

AN ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY.

The Oldest Literary and Family Paper in the United States.—Founded August 4, A. D. 1821.

Vol. LVI. | BENNETT & PITCH, No. 700 Sansom St. | PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1876. | $2.50 a Year, in Advance. Five Cents a Copy. | No. 19

LOVE'S ADVICE.

BY CHARLES S. LARNED.

Why, O, lover, shouldst thou weep?
Or why so deeply groan?
There never was a love so fast asleep,
But what some sunbeams
Sang a little song of love,
After the lover was gone!

Then pluck thee a rose, and smile thy bud!
Absence kills the flame
That, as a spark in the fickle breast,
Waits thee back again:
If thou art true, and really love,
Then 'twon her not in vain!

A NEW STORY!

In the next number we shall commence a new story of rare interest, entitled

A DREAM OF SPRING!

Translated from the German of the eminent novelist, Johannes Van Dewall, for the SATURDAY EVENING POST.

We can assure our readers that it will be a rare treat, full of character-painting of a high order, charming in style, and with deep interest sustained to the end. One of the best stories we have read in years.

THE LILY OF ST. ERNE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MOTHER'S SECRET," "HELENA LYLE," ETC.

(This story was commenced in No. 4, Vol. 55. Back numbers can always be obtained.)

CHAPTER XXIX.

BETRAYED.

As his host only put his head in at the door of the drawing room to say good night, and Mrs. Penruan seen deeply over the game at chess Max played with her for her amusement, he also went to his room at an early hour. Too much excited to feel sleepy, he lit his pipe, opened the window, and, with arms folded on the sill, stood there, thinking over the strange occurrences that had befallen him since he came to Cornwall.

How many of them had been crowded into the short space of a few weeks! His fall from the cliffs—his interview with Letty—his odd recognition at Penruan and first rencontre with Eleanor—and then the gradual unfolding of the evil character of the kinsman by whose hands such intricate knots were tied in the destiny of the two fair girls, who had found themselves so dependent upon him.

The more Max received the subject in his mind, the more he revolted in spirit at the idea of letting this man remain in full possession of the property that should pertain to the orphan heiress of Mr. Haydon. No one could be less eager than himself about money; but this was such a flagrant case of wrong-doing, that he longed to have a tussle with the usurper, and wrest from him all of which he was unjustly in possession. But how to effect this was a difficult question; and Max—though not gifted with much worldly experience—was endowed with enough to know that he would be easily outwitted by one who had every trick and turn of the law at his fingers' ends.

"I suppose we must leave him to run his course," was the conclusion he eventually arrived at. "He is a prematurely aged and miserable man, who, in the course of a few years at furthest, will be obliged to acknowledge that his ill-gotten gains are of very little use to him. My Letty and I will make ourselves contented at Agnes Dolben. If we can coax Eleanor and Mrs. Penruan to join us there, Charlie Reuton will follow; and then, if we are all poor, we shall be happy together, and, therefore, more blest in our poverty than Squire Penruan in all his riches!"

While Max mused, his pipe went out, and he was leisurely refilling it, when a low tap at his door made him pause and listen. It was repeated, and this time so imperatively, that, no longer in doubt, he asked who was there.

"It is I—Eleanor! If you are still up, open quickly; if not, rise, and join us in the corridor as soon as you can."

Three or four of Max Haveryng's long strides brought him to the door, and, flinging it open, he saw that Eleanor stood there, her eyes glittering with excitement; while Letty and Mrs. Morrison, muffled in dark shawls, were at no great distance.

Before he could ask what had happened, she pointed to the hall below.

"Look who goes there! Mr. Penruan himself! His evil genius has betrayed him into our hands! We have but to follow, and perhaps the desk is ours!"

Max stepped forward, and glanced over the balustrade. Yes; there, lamp in hand, his eyes wildly staring, went the Squire, muttering to himself as he slowly stumbled along.

"How did you discover his condition?" the young man whispered to Eleanor, who had followed him, trembling with the agitation that she could not overcome.

"We sat talking after you left us," she explained, in the same subdued tones, "till Morrison insisted that Letty and I should go to bed. But a restless spirit was upon both of us; and, instead of obeying, we persuaded her to accompany us to the study, to examine an old cabinet, which belonged to my father, and in which Letty fancies the missing desk may be hidden. It was she whom Mr. Penruan saw in his study one morning, when she had ventured there at a very early hour, to test her recollection of a secret spring that opened the lower part of the cabinet. You remember how my maid was falsely accused of being the culprit, and how my assertions of her innocence were rudely scouted?"

Max nodded, and Eleanor went on.

"We were on our way to the study, when Mr. Penruan appeared in the corridor above, walking in his sleep as you now see him. Pray Heaven that he unconsciously gives us this night the clue so long sought—so urgently needed!"

"I do not like dogging his steps while he is in this state," murmured Letty, with a shiver. "Let us go away, dear Nell. He might awaken suddenly, as he did when Morison was at his elbow—and then what should we do?"

"I will risk it, and alone, if no one else has courage to accompany me!" exclaimed Eleanor. "He is making for the cellars, in which Morison has convinced herself and me that he conceals the proofs of his guilt. If he enters them, I will follow, let the consequences be what they may!"

Before anyone could hinder it, she boldly descended the stairs; but as she reached the foot of them, Mr. Penruan, setting down his lamp and keys, came rapidly towards her.

With a smothered shriek, Eleanor recoiled; and Max, putting aside the clinging arms of Letty, would have hastened to interpose betwixt the startled girl and her step-father; but with the vacant gaze of somnambulism, the sleep-walker passed closely beside her, returned up-stairs, and in another minute had disappeared from their view.

Almost before he was out of sight, Eleanor, her courage returning, darted forward to seize the keys. With the same impetuous haste, she hurried toward the door that had baffled Morison's curiosity, inserted one after another, till the right one was found, and ere her friends could join her, was descending the narrow flight of stone steps, with the lamp held high over her head.

Morison, as eager as herself, glided after her; but Max and Letty lingered on the threshold, for the young man recoiled from prying into the secrets even of a villain, and his betrothed, affected by the silence of the hour, the ghastly visage of Mr. Penruan, and the importance of the search in which Eleanor was engaging, could scarcely support herself.

"Are we doing right, Max?" she faltered. "Tell me—you, who are wiser than I—are we justified in doing this?"

But while she hesitated how to satisfy her scruples and his own, Eleanor's voice summoned them both.

"Max—Letty—the desk is here! I have found it hidden in an old chest. Come quickly, that we may open it together, and possess ourselves of the will."

Unable to resist the summons, they both hastened to join her. Within a small inner cellar, or vault, she was kneeling before the worm-eaten chest, which was the only movable it contained. From this chest, which appeared to be filled articles of value, old plate, packets of papers, deeds, &c., she had drawn the well-remembered desk, and was wrenching it open with Morison's scissors.

The lid yielded just as Letty crouched down beside her, with Max looking over her shoulder; and ere long Eleanor, breathing thankful exclamations, extracted from the secret drawer a paper which, when unfolded proved to be the one they sought.

Though very simply worded, it was not wanting in any forms necessary to render it legal; and it set forth that the testator thereby revoked all former wills and codicils, and left the whole of his property to his cousin, Eleanor and Violet Haydon, subject only to a handsome annuity which was to be paid to their mother and his beloved wife, Matilda Haydon.

The sisters kissed and embraced each other, then threw their arms round the neck of Mrs. Morison, who was equally overjoyed at this discovery; but Max was not able to rejoice with them yet. He could not help thinking of the disgrace that awaited his kinsman, the unhappy man who had perilled his soul and his good name—for what? An income that he was too miserly to spend; the power of amassing money which he had no son to inherit, and gloating over it, though he was continually harassing himself lest he should be defrauded of some infinitesimal part by a needy tenant or defaulting debtor.

"Are you sorry that the Widow Hayne has proved an heiress, after all?" Letty whispered to her lover, as they were preparing to quit the vault.

"Almost!" was on his lips, but ere the word was spoken, the door of the inner cellar in which they were standing swung to with a hollow sound, that startled them all.

"It is the wind," said Morison, who was shading the lamp with her hand. "It was only the wind;" but she looked very white and terrified as she spoke. "Open the door, will you, Mr. Haveryng, and let us get back to the hall, and replace the keys before they are missed?"

Max made no reply, but his face had grown as pallid as her own; for when the door closed, his quicker ear had caught the sound of a bolt shooting into its socket. He set his back against the portal, and, as he had anticipated, it resisted his every effort. They were entrapped. The true will was in their hands; but they were in the power of Mr. Penruan.

Bitterly did Max rue the reluctance to suspect anyone, however faulty, which had made him neglect those signs, which, to another, would have been so ominous of danger. Now that it was too late, he could no longer doubt that the step he had heard in the ruins was the wily Squire's. Mr. Penruan, always distrustful, always inquisitive, had, doubtless, been surprised at the young man's hasty retreat from the dinner table, and must have been hovering near when he entered the ruins that night with Letty and Mrs. Morison. If he had dogged them then, and overheard their explanations, he knew that his own downfall was at hand, unless he could contrive to secure himself. But was it by murder that he intended to do this? Had he launched sleep only to lure them into a trap from which there was no escape?

Yes, yes—it must be so! And as this terrible conviction strengthened, Max groaned in an agony that was akin to madness. For himself, death in such a shape—the slow torture of starvation—was awful, almost beyond description; but to see it shared by the innocent girl he loved, and two other creatures as helpless as herself, was unutterable.

"Don't look at me so strangely," gasped Letty, who began to comprehend that something was wrong. "You are frightening Eleanor, as well as me!"

"Nonsense!" cried Eleanor, who had been too busy with the will to perceive their changed looks. "Of what should I be frightened, now that I know that I am able to set our tyrant at defiance?"

But she, too, grew cold with dismay, when Esther Morison began to wring her hands, and wail, "Oh, we were mad, mad, not to keep a better watch! He has stolen upon us, while we thought of nothing but finding the desk; and who shall rescue us from this dreadful place?"

"We must be patient for a few hours, and then shout for help," said Max, speaking as cheerfully as he could. "The servants will hear our cries, and set us at liberty."

But the woman shook her head despairingly.

"They will never hear us! How would our voices reach the hall, with half the doors of these vaults closed, and every caution taken to prevent it? It is hopeless—hopeless!"

As the idea of her meaning entered Eleanor's mind, she grew frantic with terror, and beat against the walls of her cage, till her hands were bruised and bleeding.

"I will not die thus!" she raved. "Don't touch me! Don't talk to me!" And she thrust away the loving arms Letty twined about her. "I cashed be resigned to such a death just as happiness was in my reach! Oh, Charlie, Charlie, if you were but here to save me!"

But presently she grew calmer, in her consciousness that all prayers, all entreaties were unavailing, and came and knelt down beside her sister, whose face, colorless as the pure flower to which Max likened her, lay on his breast.

"And this is the end of all poor Morison's scheming, and the cager hopes in which I was indulging? But I will murmur no more. Your resignation, dearest Letty, shames me."

"I am not resigned," was the reply; "for I am still hopeful. We shall not be left to perish. Can we forget that One greater than Mr. Penruan sees us in our prison, and can save us if He sees fit?"

"Letty is right," said Max, rousing himself from the stupor into which he had fallen. "We will emulate her child-like faith, and strive to be equally patient and hopeful. But first let us try whether we cannot effect our own deliverance!"

Accordingly, the walls of the vault were explored, to ascertain whether any other mode of egress could be discovered, but there was none; and when compelled to give up this hope, Max turned his attention to the door, to see whether it would be pried from its hinges. But with no tools save a penknife and Esther's scissors, what impression could he make upon solid oak and rusty iron screws? After many efforts, he was obliged to confess himself wrested.

Then it was that the prisoners, praying silently, sat down together on the hard earth, feeling that they could do no more, but must abide the issue of events. To Max and Letty there was a certain comfort in sharing whatever fate was in store for them; and when a spasm contracted the young man's features, the sweet voice of his betrothed murmured consolation.

Esther Morison had bowed her head on her knees, in the sort of apathy that sometimes renders persons of her frame of mind capable of enduring, with apparent indifference, whatever befalls them. Perhaps she grieved more for the fair girl over whom she had watched so long and tenderly than for herself. Perhaps her thoughts had flown to the cottage on the beach, where she had hoped to end her days with the good old fisherman, her brother.

Eleanor Haydon was the one who suffered most intensely. Her vivid imagination pictured Charles Renton's astonishment when he learned that she had disappeared at the same time with Max Haveryng, and it added poignancy to the anguish of such a separation to know that if she perished in this captivity, he might go to his own grave believing her to have falsely fled with the Californian. Even supposing suspicions of something wrong were aroused, and a search for the missing ones instituted, who would imagine they were still in the Abbey? Who would reveal to Charles Renton the terrible truth that after hours of such sufferings, both mental and bodily, as no pen could describe, Eleanor—his Eleanor—had died miserably in her own home?

HOME FOR THANKSGIVING.

As if to complicate the horror of their position, the lamp, a small chamber one, began to burn dimly. When that went out they would be left in total darkness; and though it was carefully lowered to a mere glimmer, they knew that no lengthened period would elapse before the moment they dreaded arrived.

Before this occurred, Max looked at his watch. Slowly though the hours had moved, morning must have dawned in the blue sky on which their eyes might never gaze again. The few servants employed in the house must be up and about their customary vocations, and Max shouted long and lustily, in the hope that through some cranny or crevice the sounds might make their way, and bring succor. But though he repeated his calls till he was hoarse, no answering voice was heard; and even Eleanor, the last to acknowledge the uselessness of his efforts, muttered, "It is in vain—man has forsaken us!"

And then the lamp suddenly flickered and went out, and Max could no longer behold the dear eyes that had met his own so lovingly, nor Eleanor gather renewed patience from the sweet composure that sat on Letty's pure, pale face. But the rebellious cry on her lips was stifled by the sweet notes of Letty's voice, and though she could not join in the hymns the young girls sang with such unfaltering tones, her murmurings were stilled.

Letty sang on till she was overpowered with weariness. Her eyes insensibly closed, and she sank into a slumber as profound and peaceful as she had every enjoyed. And Max, as he tenderly sustained her and listened to her quiet breathing, was almost ready to pray that she might never again awaken to the dreadful reality. He tried to speak consolation to Eleanor, whose sobs distracted him, but the meaningless words died on his tongue, and it was an unspeakable relief when she, too, became so silent that he had reason to believe she had succumbed to the fatigue and agitation of the last few hours as well as her sister.

Without following the example of his weary companions, Max had suffered his thoughts to wander away to his distant home, and, half dozing, half waking, was beholding once more the sun sink behind the mountains that sheltered the beautiful valley in which it lay, when, as if subjected to an electric shock, he suddenly leaped to his feet.

Letty, who was still clasped in his arms, awoke, demanding fearfully what was the matter, but the question elicited no reply. Shaking from head to foot, his heart throbbing madly, he uttered one sharp "Hush!" and then stood listening—listening with an eagerness that scarcely suffered him to draw breath.

What had he heard? Anything? or had his excited imagination played him some cruel trick? Just as Letty had decided that the latter must be the true explanation of his condition, a human voice, heard faintly, yet not to be mistaken, fell upon the ears of the captives.

"There is nothing here," it said; "so let us go."

Oh! the frantic ring of the wild, appealing cries that these words evoked! Even Esther Morison was aroused from her apathy, and shrieked for help as loudly as the rest.

Were they heard? Would the help they invoked be given; or was it Mr. Penruan himself, who, mocking their agony, came but to depart again, leaving them to redoubled gloom and despair?

No, No! eager hands were at work at the bolts, and keys were brought and fitted to the lock, till with a click, it opened, and Eleanor, hysterical in her joy, rushed out into the light of day and the embrace of Charlie Renton.

CHAPTER XXX.

A HAPPY DELIVERANCE FROM ALL TROUBLES.

Like one stupefied with astonishment, stood Captain Renton, staring first at the sobbing girl in his arms and then at Esther Morison and Max, who, half-blinded by the light, and burdened with the now fainting Letty, came from the inner vault, uttering fervent and grateful thanks to him for coming to their assistance.

"Do not give me praises which I have done nothing to merit," he answered, at length. "How could I know that Eleanor and you were shut that dismal hole? Good Heavens! what does it mean?"

"More air—let us have fresher air before we stay to explain!" cried Mrs. Morison, pointing out the condition of Letty. "Let us leave these dungeons before Mr. Penruan can learn that we are free."

Accordingly, they ascended to the hall; but here another pause was made, for the old gardener, who had been Captain Renton's sole companion, astonished them by observing, "Mr. Penruan is not at the Abbey; he left here before nine this morning."

Max glanced at the clock; it was now noon, and as his companions were exhausted for want of food, he would have summoned some of the servants to bring refreshments; but another surprise awaited him. The domestics had been discharged, their wages paid that were due to them, and they had all quitted the Abbey before their master departed.

"What reason did Mr. Penruan give for these extraordinary proceedings?" asked Eleanor.

The old man scratched his head.

"Well, miss, no offence, but he said it was on your account he were going."

"On mine?"

"Yes, miss. The servants was rung up at daybreak, and told that you had gone off with Mr. Haveryng, and that master must go in pursuit without delay. It was all bustle and hurry-scurry, and the mistress, so I heard say, was almost in fits, she was so shocked and upset. Her maid, too, declared that it was quite impossible for her to get ready at such short notice. But the Squire he swore a great oath, that, packed or not packed, he'd go away by the first train; and he kept his word, he did, and sent every one out of the house before he went out; except me and my wife, that's left in the house, you see, miss and gentlemen, to take care of it till further orders."

His auditors glanced at each other. Had Mr. Penruan deliberately left them there to die, and hurried away from the scene of his crime, lest remorse should seize him ere it was fully consummated?

"Did he leave no message for any one? Was it by his commands you were searching the cellars?" asked Eleanor.

"Nay, miss; he wrote a letter just before he went, which he bade me post for the Captain here; but he come afore I could send it away."

"Yes," said Captain Renton; "I left London immediately on the receipt of your telegram, travelled all night, and arrived at the Abbey about an hour after its owner had so suddenly left it. My first impulse, I will own"—and now he colored deeply—"was to follow Mr. Penruan, and aid him in discovering whither the fugitives had flown."

"Charlie! Did you, then, believe the shameful story of my flight?" Eleanor reproachfully demanded.

"My dear love, what was I to think?"

"Think anything but that your friends were false, either to themselves or you! However, I will for once be merciful, and let your own conscience punish you. Violet, this gentleman, who is so very ready to suspect your sister and your affianced husband scarcely wants an introduction to you; but as I have chosen to forgive him, I must beg you to be equally indulgent."

It cost some time, and a lengthened explanation, to make Charles Renton comprehend that the beautiful young creature who gave him her hand with such blushing grace, was the unfortunate whose name had been rarely spoken for so many years; and Eleanor was so impatient to question him further, that she would scarcely give him time to utter his congratulations to her pretty sister.

"The letter that was to be forwarded to you—pray show it us! What could be Mr. Penruan's motives for making you his confidant?"

Captain Renton looked puzzled as he drew forth the epistle.

"I can scarcely say that he did so, for his note—it is nothing more—is so mysteriously worded, that, had I received it in town, as he intended that I should, I doubt very much whether it would have brought me to Cornwall!"

"Do not tell me that!" exclaimed Eleanor, with a shudder. "Recollect that we must inevitably have perished if you had not come! But what does Mr. Penruan say?"

"Simply this:—'I am about to leave England, perhaps for ever; my motives for what I have done do not concern you or any one else; every man has a right to take care of his own interests in whatever way he thinks best. I have, I hope, secured mine; and so I can afford to be more merciful than those who have dogged and distrusted me deserve that I should be. When this reaches you, you can go to Penruan, and ask the gardener for the packet I left with him, directed to you. Within it are some keys; open the doors they fit; and do your worst, or best, I care not!'"

"Then, after all, he did not mean us to die!" cried Max, with an air of relief. "He evidently meditated nothing more than to give us a good fright."

"But how if Charlie, believing that no one was left in the Abbey, had neglected the injunction contained in this very enigmatical letter?" asked Eleanor; and every one looked grave and declined replying, for how could they forget on what a seeming chance their fate had depended? If Captain Renton, thirsting for revenge, had followed his first impulse, and rushed away in pursuit of the supposed fugitives, what would have become of the imprisoned party? It was well for them all that, conjecturing Mr. Penruan's locked doors to contain some papers or parchments of importance to Eleanor, he had tried cabinets, and escritoires, and closets, until, chancing to discover that one of the keys fitted the half-hidden door in the hall, he reminded himself that misers sometimes choose strange hiding-places, and descended with Jones to examine the cellars.

"Let us be thankful our lives have been preserved!" Letty was the first to say; "and not inquire too curiously into Mr. Penruan's intentions. It seems to me of far more consequence to ascertain whither he purposes dragging our poor mother, and how she will fare at his hands when he is compelled to give up the property he had so basely appropriated."

Both Max and Captain Renton felt a little remorse at their utter forgetfulness of Mrs. Penruan, who was so helplessly in the power of her unprincipled husband; and, after a long consultation, it was determined that the two young ladies, accompanied by Esther Morison, should depart for London forthwith, there to put themselves under the protection of a matronly friend of Eleanor's until Mr. Haydon's last will could be proved, and his daughters obtained possession of their property.

Max and Charlie Renton went to town by the same train, and communicated immediately with a clever lawyer. Through his agency, before another week had elapsed, they learned that Mr. Penruan, after turning everything he could lay his hands upon into cash, raising money upon valuable securities, and even selling the costly jewelry of his wife, was on the point of embarking for some far-distant country. He had decided on this course as soon as he made the alarming discovery that Violet Haydon was not the helpless idiot whom he had regarded as a nonentity; and he carried away with him so large a portion of his ill-gotten gains, that he would be wealthy despite the necessity of relinquishing what no cunning would enable him to retain longer.

Still, those he had injured and despoiled so shamelessly that the lawyers exclaimed in astonishment at the audacity of his proceedings, hesitated to put the hounds of justice upon his track. For Mrs. Penruan's sake, they proposed to let him go free, and content themselves with knowing that he could never molest or wrong them again; and when the vessel sailed in which he had taken a passage, it was agreed by common consent that his name should never be spoken more.

But even Max, the most clement of them all—the one who had striven most earnestly to palliate his kinsman's conduct—was stirred with indignation when, by the merest chance, it was discovered that, although Mr. Penruan had been careful to convey his wife's luggage on board, he had been equally careful to leave the wife herself behind him, regarding her, it is presumed, as an incumbrance he preferred to be without.

Her anxious daughters found the poor lady in a squalid lodging at Wapping, her health really affected by the atmosphere in which she was living, and her terror of the drunken landlady, who was robbing her of the very small sum of money she possessed. Too inert to do anything but pity herself, she thankfully hailed the appearance of Eleanor, and soon learned to cling for comfort and support to that other daughter, who now claimed a share of her affection.

By very slow degrees, Mrs. Penruan was made to believe that she was not the helpless invalid she had imagined herself; when this had been accomplished she soon became stout and rosy; and, in the course of years, developed into a tolerably fair specimen of a grandmamma to half a dozen noisy, merry children. She wept so bitterly when an effort was made to reveal to her the treacherous conduct of Mr. Penruan, that Charlie Renton, to whom the task was deputed, was silenced; and it is doubtful whether she ever thoroughly understood how basely he had acted.

When he was drowned during a gale in sight of the land to which he had fled, his widow, the only person who did not regard his fate as just retribution, insisted on erecting a handsome monument to his memory in the church at St. Erne; and it was noticed that though she never named him to Eleanor or Letty, she spoke of him to others with bated breath, as a remarkable man, whose decease was a great loss to everyone who knew him. It was a happy delusion, and her friends permitted her to indulge in it.

As soon as the co-heiresses had been put in possession of their property with all due legality, Eleanor and Charles Renton, Violet and her faithful Max, were quietly married at St. Erne, old Dan Calynack being one of the most interested spectators of the ceremony; and Max bore his bride to his home across the sea. But Aquas Dulces, despite its loveliness, was no fit abode for a gentle lady. A tribe of hostile Indians had settled in the neighborhood, and were constantly perpetrating such atrocious deeds, that the young couple finally returned to England.

St. Erne and its lovely scenery was so dear to them, that after a few weeks spent in London with the gay Eleanor, who was soon fairly launched in society, and promising to be one of its most brilliant ornaments, they hastened to the Abbey. But the dwelling itself revived so many hateful reminiscences, that it was finally determined to pull it down.

Accordingly, this was done, and a handsome mansion erected in its stead. No traces remain of the chamber in the room where the faithful Esther guarded her fragile flower from the eyes of Mr. Penruan; and the memory of his ill deeds has been almost effaced by the purer lives and generous acts of those who now hold the estate.

Captain and Mrs. Renton often revisit the spot, and make the new house gay with their lively doings; but better known and better loved in the little fishing village, which is fast rising into a busy town under the auspices of Max Haveryng, is the Californian's fair wife—the gentle but queenly Letty, whom her adoring husband still, in moments of enthusiasm, calls by the name he first gave her—the Lily-flower of St. Erne!

THE END.

CONJURERS AND SPIRITUALISTS.

IN TWO PARTS.—PART I.

Down to a comparatively recent period the science of spiritualism has contented itself with vagaries in the shape of rappings and various other manifestations, which, while revealing the supposed presence of spirits, have presented nothing very tangible. The seance has served its purpose by attracting and mystifying an audience, who, paying handsomely for an exhibition of tambourine-beating, horn-blowing, and bell-ringing in a darkened chamber, have retired more mystified than ever. The spirit, ubiquitous in its movements, has refused to be fixed. A step, however, has at length been taken in another direction; "spirits," though still refusing to be captured like ordinary mortals, have consented to allow themselves to be photographed! They now obediently follow those whom they watch, to the studios of photographers, and there falling into a graceful attitude, allow those who believe themselves to be accompanied through life by a "guardian angel" to satisfy their vanity (and credulity) by having a carte-de-visite taken of themselves and their "attendant spirit." The resulting carte gives such an air of reality to the affair, that it is considered rank folly to doubt any longer, when the spirits can be actually photographed, and thus brought within the ken of the most hardened skeptic.

Such piteous folly on one side and arrant deception on the other are more prevalent than ordinary folks generally suppose. A case brought to our notice from Paris will illustrate the way in which this class of photographers impose on the public. The police, hearing that a certain photographer of that city was pocketing large profits by taking these photographs for credulous people, despatched an emissary to discover the fraud. On making known his wish to be photographed with his guardian spirit, he was requested to leave the studio for a short time for the purpose of the spirit being invoked. During his absence, a plate, prepared in the ordinary way, was exposed to light for a few seconds opposite a screen whereupon a vague ghostly image was figured. The man's photograph superposed—gave, it is needless to say, the required effect. The photographer, on a hint from the police, ceased to take spirit photographs.

These photographs may also be produced by the photographer's common process of printing from two negatives; one negative takes the sitter, the other the "spirit" as before; on printing from both, the effects are combined. Another method depends upon a curious electrical fact. If a tinfoil device be laid between two sheets of glass, and tinfoil be laid on the outer surfaces of the glass, and then electric sparks passed between the tinfoil coatings, it is found that an image of the device is formed upon the two glass plates, caused by a molecular change in the glass. This image is at first invisible, but on breathing on the glass it becomes visible, and a photograph can then be taken of it in the ordinary way.

But the cleverest plan of all is that which utilises the lately discovered optical principle known as fluorescence. Paint on a white screen with sulphate of quinine (which is colorless) something shadowy to represent the "ethereal being." Expose this to bright sunlight for a short time, and then place your unsuspecting believer in "guardian angels" before this screen; photograph him in the ordinary way, and at the same time you obtain a picture of your painting about which he is ignorant. Finish the photograph in the ordinary way. The quinine drawing will "come out" hazy and indistinct as part of the picture; and then your believer in spirits, who has longed to have his "attendant spirit" manifested to him, receives it tremblingly with gratitude. Alas for the credulity of mankind!

Without discussing in detail any more "spiritual manifestations," let us proceed to illustrate the following proposition—that conjurers, apart from any nonsense about spirits, black or white, visible or invisible, can perform, have performed, and are now performing achievements more surprising than any well-authenticated cases of so-called spiritualism.

Although full of the vanity so often displayed by thorough Frenchmen, Robert Houdin, in his Memoirs, gives us a reliable account of the long course of practice and study which enabled him to become the prince of conjurers, and which (we may infer) similarly fitted Frikell, Robins, Jacobs, Bosco, Hermann, Anderson, Stodare, Heller, Lynn, Maskelyne, &c., to bewilder their audiences with feats which fully equal those of the "spirit mediums" in explicability, without being disfigured by the roguеries and silliness chargeable to too many of those who pretend that disembodied beings, supramundane or submundane, participate in the manifestations. Sir David Brewster's Natural Magic is full of instructive information on the possible—and in most cases verified—means of developing phenomena of a startling character in a simple way; and Sir Walter Scott's Demonology and Witchcraft is worth studying in a similar spirit. Dr. Paris, Professor Faraday, Dr. Tyndall—all have contributed to the available stock of information on these points.

As a knowledge of the physical sciences plays a most important part in matters of this kind, the exhibitor, when he possesses more of this knowledge than the majority of his audience, and is withal an ingenious contriver of mechanism, has immense powers of cajoling. When Robert Houdin went to Algeria, part of his work (at the suggestion of the French government) was to detect and expose certain Arab sorcerers, who had obtained a pernicious hold over the minds of the ignorant natives. He experienced no great difficulty in ferreting out their secrets—clever achievements, but with no more sorcery in them than in Houdin himself. What he particularly aimed at, however, was to outdo the Arabs in their own craft; to achieve, in the presence of spectators, phenomena which would plunge the sorcerers into blank amazement. His famous feat in this line was, at the word of command, to reduce a strong stalwart Algerian to the weakness of a child, and then as instantly restore his strength again. The man could or could not lift an iron box from the floor, just as Houdin willed that he should or should not. The surprise of the Arabs at this feat amounted to awe and consternation. Houdin (previously preparing his room for the purpose) had availed himself of the beautiful discovery in electro-magnetism, whereby a bar of soft iron can instantly be made a magnet by sending an electric current in coils around it, and then de-magnetised by suspending the current. How such a piece of iron below the floor of the room could be made, at the pleasure of the conjurer, to tighten and loosen the iron box resting on the floor, the reader will be to understand by a little consideration. That most elegant of public exhibitions in England, the "Invisible Girl," was the product of an inventor familiar with accoustical science; it was a skilful application of the principle that sound will retain its power for long distances when conveyed through a tube or pipe. The tiny lady-like voice, speaking and singing in a metal globe a few inches in diameter, was one of the most inexplicable things ever brought before an audience; yet was it perfectly consistent with known physical laws. We cannot repress a belief that the Invisible Girl would have vanquished many a "spirit-voice," just as Robert Houdin vanquished the Arab sorcerers.

Connected with the same accoustic principles are many public performances which never fail to excite astonishment in the minds of persons unprepared or only half-prepared to trace them to their scientific foundation. Ventriloquism ("voice issuing from the stomach") is a striking case in point. The pitch, loudness, and timbre or quality of a sound greatly influence our judgment in determining its direction and distance; the ventriloquist has a peculiar power of varying these conditions; and thus he can make his audience believe that sounds, really issuing from his mouth (albeit the lips may be quite motionless), come from a distance—down the chimney, up from a cellar, out of a small box, in from the street, or what not. He would be a bold man who would deny that some at least of the "spirit-voices" of recent times are the product of successful ventriloquism. That we must not always "believe our own ears" was amply proved by the late Mr. Love, whose ventriloquistic wonders still cling to the memory of those who heard them; if ever a man's voice issued from a box that did not contain a man, it could not have deceived the audience more completely than did Mr. Love's box-voice performance.

The phrase just used, "believe our own ears," leads us to a far more important matter connected alike with conjuring and with spiritualistic performances. It is now quite certain that we must not always "believe our own eyes." The retina is susceptible of being set into vibratory action by organic causes within the eye or the head itself; and a luminous sensation is experienced without, or wholly independent of, any rays of light entering the pupil of the eye. The superstitous fears entertained in the darkness of night by weak persons, especially if badness of health be superadded to ignorance and timidity, are largely dependant on luminous impressions in the eye not caused by any optical rays received from without. The optical-chemical phenomenon of phosphorescence has had much to do with the production of "mysterious lights," accidentally or designedly as the case may be; and many a thrilling story of "spectral" appearances stands sadly in need of scrutiny on this ground. Let us take an incident mentioned in a recent number of the Journal (p. 415), and draw an inference from it. A scientific man describing some experiments he had made with phosphuretted hydrogen (the gases which produces Will-o'-the-wisp), remarks: "On retiring to bed, I found my body quite luminous, with a glow like that of phosphorous when exposed to the air. Either some of the gas having escaped combustion, or the product of its burning, must have been absorbed in the system, and the phosphorus afterwards separated at the surface have then undergone slow combustion." We have here italicised a few words which are well worth the reader's attention. Neither as a conjurer nor as a spirtualist, neither intending or expecting any such phenomenon, a chemical experimentor found his body, in the darkness of night, enveloped in a weird-like spectral luminosity, well calculated to give origin to a narrative of "spirit-lights" to those who believe in such things.

Personal peculiarities are largely concerned in some conjuring tricks. Robert Houdin, when a youth, saw an exhibitor spitted through the body with a sword; and when himself an experienced conjurer, showed how this might be done. If the man were spare of body, tightly compressed round the middle, and provided with a false abdomen, a sword might be passed right through his apparent body without lacerating or even touching the skin. A seeming stabbing through the nose with a penknife, and the sword-swallowing trick, he similarly unmasked by careful observation. The "rope trick," in which the conjurers fully equal the spiritualists, illustrates the remarkable way in which the muscles can, in some persons, be distended and contracted at pleasure. By a strong indraught of breath, and an exercise of will, a man can readily expand his circumference, or that of his arms, during the tying of a rope, and collapse again when the time for self-untying has arrived. Some individuals are so strangely jointed that they can perform apparent miracles upon themselves in an instant. A celebrated exemplar of this class was Joseph Clark, a posturer in the time of Charles II. He was so exceptionally formed, and had such absolute command of muscles and joints, that he could become as it were some one else in a moment—now a hunchback; now an obese man, as if "with good capon lined;" now a skin-and-grief, and anon with one foot heel foremost and the other toe foremost. He thoroughly deceived a distinguished surgeon once, who dismissed him as a hopeless cripple; and on another occasion bewildered a tailor by an inexplicable change of bulk and shape when new garments were taken home.

Digital, ocular, and bodily expertness acquired by long practice in particular ways, help many a conjurer to achieve results which (in other circles) would be attributed to "spirits." Robert Houdin trained himself and his little son, during many walks through the streets of Paris, to a wonderful quickness of eye in discriminating dozens of different objects seen merely at a glance. Passing a toy-shop, father and son would try which could remember and name the greatest number of trinkets displayed in the window; or at a book-seller's, the greatest number of titles of books and names of authors—merely by a glance while walking slowly along. He humorously, but probably with some truth, declared that the gentler sex especially can do this in their own particular way; let one lady pass another in the street, and, with surprising quickness, each will have scanned the dress of the other from top to toe, from hat-feather to boots, so as to be able to describe and criticise it with wondrous minuteness in regard to color, shape, material, quality, and condition. Success in this rapid discrimination has much to do with the clairvoyant exhibitions of the superior grade of conjurers. Numerous small articles, held up by the visitors in the room, are discriminated and mentally catalogued in an instant; and the experimenter, in questioning the blindfolded confederate, uses such words (previously agreed upon) as will suggest the proper answer to the question itself. Robert Houdin was, we believe, the inventor of this capital trick, in which he has been followed with more or less success by imitators of both sexes; he never professed for an instant to be guided by "spirits," yet his clairvoyance was quite as surprising as that of the so-called "mediums." Expertness of fingers is another of the items in the training of a successful conjurer. The tricks with cards, which so thoroughly baffle ordinary spectators, depend mostly on a efficacy of touch which few of us can appreciate. The plate-spinning of circus and acrobatic performers, surprising in its appearance, is due simply to the effect of centrifugal motion (produced by slight movements of the performer's hands) in preventing the plate from falling on one side rather than another. A trained eye and trained hand act in conjunction in the feat of keeping up four balls in the air while the performer is reading a book; while trained eye, muscles, and powers of equilibrium are all brought into requisition by the circus rider, who spins several plates and tosses several balls while galloping round the arena.

In another paper we shall notice the inexplicable nature of some kinds of automatic exhibitions, such as those performed by Messrs. Maskelyne and Cooke.

(CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.)

DINNER IN SIBERIA.

A letter from Siberia says:—"Our dinner-party in the evening—and it was really a dinner-party—was extremely merry. Each one laid his stores under contribution. Some brought out frozen bread, others frozen caviare, others still frozen preserves, others again sausages which could not be bent even if put against the knee and pulled with all the strength of both arms. Can you imagine without laughing the appearance presented of seven half-famished people sitting at table with thirty dishes before them, and unable to touch one of them except at the risk of breaking their teeth? Nothing could be done except to wait patiently for the dishes to be thawed. Gradually as each article of food softens, faces brighten, and when at last a knife entered one of the dishes there were shouts of triumph, which announced the beginning of the meal. At the close of the dinner we ate excellent fruit, which had been kept frozen. Throughout Siberia, as soon as very cold weather sets in, all fruit is placed out of doors with a northern exposure, that the sun may never touch them. They are frozen through and through, and retain their flavor as completely as if they had just been plucked from the tree. When placed on the table they are as hard as wood; and when they fall accidentally on the floor they make the same noise that a wooden ball would do. The heat of the dining-room gradually softens them, and they resume their original form. While eating some game one day, I, out of curiosity, asked how long it had been killed. I was told, 'Over two months ago.' When cold weather sets in, nearly every butcher kills all the meat he requires during the winter. Fish become so solid that in all the markets they are seen leaning against the wall on their tails, no matter what their length or weight may be."

GILLOTT AND TURNER.

"You have heard of Gillott, have you not?" questioned he—"Gillott, the inventor of steel pens, and who amassed a fortune by them? When he had acquired wealth, desirous of possessing those objects of art which denote the presence of refinement as well as money, he went up to London to ask his banker what a rich man should do to furnish a grand house, which he had just built, best in accordance with good taste. Sitting with his legs under his banker's mahogany, he said, 'Now, what do you advise me to do?' 'Pictures, statuary, and other objects of virtu, together with a library,' suggested his host. 'But I don't know anything about these matters; I wish you would tell me how I am to go about it. Now, for pictures, for example; what's up in the market?' 'Ah! to what clever artists I can recommend you? Well, there are Mulready, Ettie, and Leslie, for figure pieces, and some of the Royal Academicians besides, well enough, in that department; but, if you prefer landscape, I should advise you to try and secure some of Turner's works. I think him superior to Claude himself, even.' 'Well, well, I can try them both. Will you please to give me their addresses?' 'I can give you the address of Turner, but Claude Lorraine's address lies beyond the grave.' 'Oh! I sha'nt try him; but give me t'other fellow's whereabouts, and I'll go to him to-morrow—him and any other picture-maker you may counsel me to employ.' The pen-maker had a large deposit with his banker's, who smiled graciously at his rough customer's want of refinement, and wrote down Turner's address and the usual number of Royal Academicians. The next morning Gillott went off in search of England's famous landscape-painter. He found the house, on the upper story of which the artist had his studio. A female servant was sweeping down the stairs when the square-built, pudgy little man presented himself, and asked if the painter-man was at home. 'Yes,' said Peggy, 'but he don't want to see nobody, and I'm not to allow anyone to go up—them's his very words.' 'Stand out of the way, young woman,' said Gillott—'stand out of the way!' and, pushing her aside, stamped defiantly upstairs. Finding the painting-room door at the top, he knocked with vigor, but got no reply; he then pushed it open, and walked into the sanctum. There sat the great painter, wholly absorbed upon a small sketch in water-color, ignoring the presence of his visitor and his blunt 'How do you do, sir?' Waiting a moment to see if the artist would notice him, and meeting with no recognition, he walked about the studio, turning the pictures (which had their faces to the wall) around, and putting them in shocking bad lights, enough to drive a painter frantic. After examining them for some time, he once more tried to attract the artist's attention. 'I say, Turner—that I believe's your name—what's the figure for this picture?' (turning it as if it were a dried codfish towards him.) The painter raised his head an instant from his board, and said, very carelessly, 'Four thousand guineas.' 'And that other one to the right,' pursued Gillott, 'what's the price of that?' 'Three thousand pounds,' was the answer. 'And this one on the left?' 'Fifteen hundred guineas.' 'I'll take the three,' said Gillott. Then Turner rose and laid down his pencils. 'Who the devil are you,' he said, 'who take the liberty to intrude into my studio against my orders? You must be a queer sort of a beggar, I fancy.' 'You're another queer beggar,' was the reply; 'I am Gillott, the pen-maker. My banker tells me that you are clever in your business, and recommends you, and I have come here to buy some of your pictures.' 'By George! you are a droll fellow, I must say.' 'You're another, I must say.' 'But,' pursued Turner, 'rough-and-ready though you are, I rather like you. Do you really want to purchase the canvases you selected?' 'Yes; in course I do, or I would not have climbed your blessed stairs this morning.' 'Well, Mr. Gillott, I must be frank with you; when I noticed you in my studio without permission, I thought it a piece of impertinence, and, when you asked the prices, I thought you did so as many vulgar people do, for mere curiosity, having no intention of buying, wishing only to know what valuation I put upon my works, and I gave you a price which suited my humor. Two of the pictures are already disposed of; the other, the first one you spoke of, is at your acceptance for a thousand pounds.' 'I will take it,' said the princely Gillott; 'and I want you to make me three or four others at your own price.' Thus the pen-maker and the eccentric artist became friends, and warm friends, too."—Appletons' Journal.

A WORKING MAN'S CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETY.

The concentration of population in the manufacturing districts of England is past belief till one has seen some such a centre as Leeds. Here the British workman may be seen at his best and at his worst. His liberal patronage of the gin-shop, and his love for the gentle bull-pup, have been a fertile theme for official pens. It is more agreeable to report what he has done to help himself, to organize his idle shillings into a federal union of dividends, and to teach himself and children sobriety and thrift.

Here is a tangible expression of Yorkshire common sense—a handsome four-story block of stores, splendid in plate-glass, carved stonework, and architectural display,—the stores of the "Leeds Industrial Co-operative Society, Limited," Albion street, Leeds. It may be Saturday afternoon—a half-holiday in the mills—and the streets swarm with work-people of every age and condition. Albion street is none too wide for the traffic that pours along its sidewalks and road-way, and gathers about the open doors of the "Leeds Industrial," actually struggling in and out, and pressing thickly up to the counters. One door leads to a grocery store, the next to a drapery story, another door leads up stairs to the house-furnishing warerooms, the outfitting department, and the boot and shoe store. There is no display in the windows (after the co-operative manner), and we may follow the multitude inside to watch the active trade. Plain, hard-working people, perhaps grimy from their toil, they press up to the counters, cash in hand, ready to buy. The salesmen have evidently prepared for a good demand, and the staple goods, already put up in convenient packages, are piled in enormous heaps on the counters. They deal out the bundles with wonderful speed, take the money, make a note in the sales-book, tear off the voucher (or half leaf), and give it with the change to the customer. Each one takes his or her goods, and moves away as quickly as possible to make room for others. Near the door, in a tiny office, such as is sometimes used for the cashier in American stores, sits a young girl. Each one presents the fly-leaf to her, and receives a tin or brass token representing the amount of the purchase. This is the evidence of trade at the society's stores, and will be a guide in estimating the allocation of profits next dividend day. For every bag of flour the member may buy he will receive back a bonus or dividend of two shillings and six-pence. On all other goods, the bonus will be two shillings and twopence in every pound these tokens represent. This is the key to this active trade; this explains this eagerness to buy; this is the "excuse for being" that the society can show.

The shops seem to be equal to the best of their class in London or New York. The stock is very large, of apparently the best quality, and is admirably put up, ready for immediate sale. Going upstairs, we find the building blockaded with people intent on trade. A woman coming downstairs, her three boys making much clatter with their new wooden shoes, brushes past a man with a wicker baby-carriage under one arm and a mop broom under the other. There is plenty of roughness, broad Yorkshire dialect, toil-stained clothing, and good English push and scramble; every man for himself; but, with all, there is a feeling for order and honest good-nature. Above-stairs, there are halls and corridors packed from floor to ceiling with boots and shoes, brushes, kitchenware, household goods, and ready-made clothing. The people swarm into every nook and corner, besiege the salesmen, and drive a lively trade. These busy shoppers and anxious buyers are the members of the Leeds Industrial—a few of the sixteen thousand shareholders, the legal owners of this building, the thirty branch stores, the shoe manufactory, and the great flour-mill at Marshall street in the Holbeck district. Every man and woman of this company has five or more shares in the society, or has paid down good shillings to let them earn the shares. Each one of these people participated in that handsome dividend of £16,506 17s. 8d. that was paid last quarter day. That is more than two pounds a year apiece, or two shillings and a trifle over in every two hundred and forty pennies they spent at the stores, besides the interest at five per cent. a year on their united share capital of £122,532 17s. 11½d.—Scribner's Monthly.

How Delightful

It is to be able to remove all the disfigurements from the skin, such as tan, freckles, moth-patches, etc. The delightful and harmless toilet preparation known as George W. Laird's "Bloom of Youth" will effectually remove all such blemish without the least of injuring the skin. It will leave the skin smooth, clear and transparently beautiful. Sold at all druggists and fancy goods dealers. Depot 5 Gold street, New York. Price 75 cents.

December 2, 1876.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

A DREAM OF SUMMER.

BY MARY B. SANDS.

Bland as the morning breath of June,
The southern breezes play;
And through its hazy blue wilder noon
Seems warm as summer's day.
The snow-plumed angel of the north
Has dropped his icy spear;
Again the mossy earth looks forth,
Again the streams gush clear.

The fox his hillside roll forsakes,
The muskrat leaves his work,
The blue bird in the meadow's brake
Is singing with the brook.
"Bear up," O Mother Nature's joy,
Bird, breeze, and streamlet free!
"Our winter comes proglacy
Of summer days to thee!"

So in those winters of the soul,
By bitter blasts and drear,
Over swept flowers Memory's frozen pole,
Will sunny days appear.
Revive the flowers of the spirit, they show
The soul its living powers,
And hope, beneath the Winter's snow,
Like grass of summer flowers.

The night is mother of the day,
The winter of the spring,
And ever upon old decay
The greenest mosses cling.
Behind the cloud the starlight lurks,
Through showers the sunbeams fall;
For God who loveth all his works,
Has left his hopes with all.

A LESSON FOR MARRIED FLIRTS.

BY SUSIE S. MORTON.

CHAPTER I.

THE BEGINNING.

I had been thinking of Fred all morning as I reclined in my easy chair, lazily smoking a cigar, and wondering why he had not been to see me since he left town this two days' trip; when, all at once, the door of my sanctum was thrown open excitedly, and with features pale and agitated, hat off, and hands buried in his auburn curls, as if he would tear them out, roots and all, my friend Frederic stood before me.

Quite unprepared for any such melo-dramatic demonstration on his part, I did nothing for the next half minute but stare blankly at him; then my scattered wits all concentrating in astonishment and curiosity, I demanded in tones of alarm: "Why, Fred, dear fellow, what's the matter? What is the matter?"

"Matter enough, Glenarm!" "I'm undone!" gasped the unhappy man.

"Why, how's that? Do explain yourself! Undone? Nonsense, man, you're jesting, are you not?"

"I wish I was, or that I had never lived to see this day! Glenarm, I'm a persecuted man—the victim of an infamous conspiracy; and, if there's no way to discover the perpetrators and gain redress, then I'm completely done for,—ruined!"

"What in the world does all this mean? Am I to understand that you are suspected of theft, forgery, burglary, or murder,—or, what is the trouble? Come, Fred, give me an intelligent account of yourself!" and I arose and placed a chair for him near my own. "There, now, be a man; and, first and foremost, Fred, explain to me the nature of the conspiracy."

"I will, and Glenarm, I may rely upon you to help me, if it is within your power, may I not?" exclaimed the poor fellow, wringing my hand with a fervor that almost brought tears of pain to my eyes.

"Yes, Fred, I pledge you my best assistance. Now, go on."

"In the first place then," began Fred, "some idiots have undertaken to play off a practical joke on me; and they have taken the meanest way in the world to do it. They have plunged me into the depths of deep air, but they have parted me from my wife—yes, they have parted us forever" and he dropped his head, and, covering his face with his hands, sobbed aloud.

"Good gracious, Fred, is that so?" and I began to think more seriously of the affair, though my bewilderment increased.

"As true as gospel, Glenarm! I protested, I entreated, I swore my innocence, my entire ignorance of the affair; but she wouldn't listen to my protestations. She scorned my entreaties; she said I had deceived her, and broken her heart, and she took the early train this morning, and has gone to her father's family convinced that I am as great a scoundrel, as deep-dyed a villain, as ever walked the earth. When her brother hears her story, he will be furious, and will never rest till he has avenged her fancied wrongs. He will shoot me, as sure as fate, if he has a chance, and I have no way to defend myself. Good heavens! what shall I do?"

He started up and clasped his hands, with a wild, despairing gesture.

"Fred," I remonstrated, growing impatient, "you are as far as ever from explaining yourself. You have not yet told me anything definite, as yet, to work on."

Controlling himself with an effort, Fred resumed his chair, and went on in a more coherent manner.

"I suppose," he said, "the perpetrator of the conspiracy wrote letters in my name, addressed to three different young ladies, who knew me, but did not know that I was married; each letter containing a proposal of marriage, and yesterday morning before I returned home, the post brought the answers, which, according to her usual custom, at my request, my wife opened and read. Here's one of the confounded things! You may read it."

He had dived excitedly into his inner coat-pocket, and brought to light several crumpled papers, one of which he placed in my hand. Smoothing it out, I behold the great scrawling characters, which I contrived to decipher as follows:

MY FREDERIC.—Ten minutes since I received your letter containing a proposal of marriage; and now I hasten gladly to answer it, for my heart responds to your call, Frederic, and I am yours, now and forever! My admiration and esteem for you have been steadily growing ever since they were first inspired by your earnest attention to business and your respectful manner towards those further advanced in years than yourself; and, —can I say it without egotism—myself, especially.

I write at once that you may receive it soon, and not leave the poor fellow to the end of my jug. Darling Frederic, I am thy PRIMROSE.

As I read this letter, not even the sight of Fred's misery could enable me to repress my laughter; but, instead of resenting this, Fred only said, while a ghost of a smile appeared in his eyes:

"Ay, you may well laugh, Charlie, for it's the greatest pack of stuff that was ever thrown together! But I—! well, here is No. 2, not so difficult a case, quite, but still awkward. You will see that No. 2 declines my suit."

"The dickens she does!" I ejaculated. "Well, then, there's one sensible woman in the world, isn't there, old fellow?" and I immediately became absorbed in the contents of the second letter. But, why transcribe? After bewailing the sad fact that he had spoken a little late,—that her hand was already pledged, though her heart must ever remain in Fred's possession, she ended with this pathetic appeal:

Try to forget me, blot out all memory of my existence, if you can; find someone more worthy of your love than I could ever be, and Look, Frederic, Frederic while striving to do my duty—my stern, sister duty, I never can forget that I love you, and you only. Forever,

ELEANORA.

Fearfully genuine the whole affair began to look, as I read this letter over, and pondered it; but, before I could offer any comments, Fred had placed in my hand a third letter, remarking as he did so, "This one caps the climax of horrors!"

Eager, of course, for the climax, I hastily read the following, written in a delicate, nervous hand, with frequent exclamation points, and extravagant style of expressions peculiar to people of passionate, excitable temperaments:

MY DEAREST.—You know I love you! Don't you know it, Fred?

You tell me that you have never loved before. Fred, do you mean it,—that I am truly your only darling?

I have read your beautiful letter over so many times. I can scarcely believe that you mean it all. Fred, if I believed that you could deceive me, even a little, I would go on and do the life which this assurance would render uncertainty. I mean to be sure you know it, Fred! I can not change my passion as nature, and Fred, if you deceive me, I shall be merely and morbidly sorrowful. You may go from earth's end to earth's end but still I will be with you, my beloved!

Oh, Fred, your coldness all these weeks has almost killed me. Was it really because you thought I loved that idiot, Charlie? Why, Fred, I hate him! Do not accuse in my thoughts towards yourself, but, by any cruel coldness or neglect, I am a tigress, when I hate; but my love is tenderer than my fury is strong.

Fred, come soon to me, else I shall be a shadowing ghost instead of your living, loving darling.

ELOISE.

Notwithstanding a certain thing of my own, in regard to these letters, which had suddenly occurred to me, and which for private reasons, I held in reserve, I felt a singular sensation thrill my nerves, as I read this letter. The passionate force,—the relentless, reckless, unreasoning feeling that ever line displayed, rather staggered me; and the awful mysteriousness of her threats, the fearfully significant way in which she intimated that if, after all, he was only trifling and deceiving her, she would herself average the wrong, made me feel a little nervous and uncomfortable for a moment. I did not wonder that Fred,—the wretched, married man, to whom these words had been addressed, should sit there, pale, agitated, distressed,—the very picture of desperation.

He had put the case into my hands. He trusted to me to help him out of the difficulty. Could I do it?

I deliberated, with those three letters spread out before me, I knit my brow in judicial thought. Fred watched me breathlessly as if upon the result of my deliberation hung all the issues of life and death.

At last I raised my eyes to him, and studied his countenance, keenly—

"Fred," I then said, slowly, "has it occurred to you to doubt the genuineness of these letters?"

"Doubt it?" he repeated, eyes wide open in amazement, "Doubt it? No!—and I do not, now. They are all genuine,—all in good faith, depend upon it."

("Nonsense! Just like Fred Percival,—too self-conscious and conceited for anything! was my mental commentary.")

"Then, you really think, do you, Fred," I went on, aloud, "That these are three young ladies in this city, so desperately in love with you?"

"Why, you see Glenarm," and he flushed a little, "the fact is, I see scores of young ladies, every day,—you know how they all flock to Trudhol and Company's—some stunning pretty ones, too, and, somehow, they all single me out, and it is hard work not to pay some attention to a pretty girl, when she does ever lastingly wish for a fellow; and I—well,—hang it, Glenarm the truth of the matter is,"—and here, Fred, after another frantic grasp of his pretty auburn curls, plunged into a down-right confession of sins which I had more than half-suspected, "the truth of the matter is, I have flirted like the mischief with some of them, and, somehow, the habit did not wear off, after I was married,—though I swear, Glenarm, that I never dreamed of being disloyal to my Fanny, or of ever caring for anyone except her. Now, I dare say that some jealous idiot, who saw how I was going on, and knew that the poor fellow didn't know of my marriage, hit upon this diabolical plan for a practical joke. I'd take my oath it was one of the fellows at the store; and, if I ever find him out,—by Jupiter!"—and Fred's flashing eyes and warming tones told that if he ever did get the offender in his hands, he could do dreadful things.

"Well, Fred," I said, assuming a very mysterious air, "don't do anything rash,—don't, I pray, go to charging this upon anyone, else you will get yourself into even more serious trouble. Let me retain these letters, and leave all to me." A light twinkle in spite of myself, crept into my eyes, as I added, "Perhaps before twenty-four hours have gone by,—before your wife has had time to reach her father's home, and despatch her big brother hither to shoot you, I shall have unraveled the whole mystery. I earnestly hope," I added, again glancing over the effusion of Eloise, "that I am not the object Charlie, "referred to, here! Do you suppose I am, Fred?"

"Oh, no, no! She means Charlie Kerr, at the store,—egregious block-head that he is! But, are you sure, Glenarm, that you see a way of clearing up the dreadful affair? What is it? Will it be clear? How will you go to work? I entreat,—I implore you, Charlie, to tell me! Do not keep me in suspense! It may seem like a light matter to you,—to see it is life, happiness,—everything."

"I know it, Fred, I know it! Compose yourself, for you will gain nothing by going frantic over the affair. It is time you were at the store. Trudhol & Co. will wonder what has become of you. Try to do your duty to-day, old fellow, and I will give myself up to the business. I promise to drain every nerve to clear up this mystery, on the solution of which your whole happiness depends."

With a gigantic effort to control himself and a fearful grasp of my hand, Fred hastened off, as soon as he was fairly out of hearing, I indulged in a hearty laugh.

"Well, well!" I exclaimed, over and over again, "in the depth of my heart, I'd that isn't a good one! Fred's in a terrible situation undoubtedly, and I can't for the life of me help thinking that he half deserves it. I do so despise a married flirt!—still, I'm sorry for the poor fellow, and must do my best to extricate him!"

Then, I settled down to business. How should I proceed in this delicate matter?

I did not, for one instant, share Fred's belief that the letters were written in serious earnest. Instead of some diabolical "fellow at the store" getting up this conspiracy to ruin his formidable rival, I saw in it the handiwork of some of those dashing girls—with whom, doubtless, Percival had been carrying on a flirtation—who had made him the victim of a practical joke, little dreaming of the fatal consequences which would ensue. The more I pondered the matter, the more thoroughly convinced I became that this was the correct theory. With this point settled, I laid in my hands the first link in the chain of evidence.

Next question:—how should I ascertain who these fair, heartless schemers were?

Difficult question! As Fred truly said, he saw hundreds of young ladies in the store every day, any one—or rather, any three—of whom his fair correspondents might be. To endeavor to trace the letters to the proper source then, would be like the proverbial search for a needle in that most improbable and unpromising locality, which we need not further specify. Still, I was not discouraged nor deserted in the least. Determined as I was to clear up this affair for Fred, I did not doubt that I should in the end, succeed.

With the letter of Eloise in my hand, I sat for an hour in deep, perplexing meditation. As I pondered it, the handwriting, though evidently an effort had been made to disguise it, seemed to grow strangely familiar. I started, as, by degrees, it all became clear to me.

Springing to my feet, I produced a key, unlocked my private desk, and took out an old autograph album. Turning the leaves, I attentively studied the chirography on every page.

In five minutes time it was done. I had watched the handwriting for an hour, and I had discovered beyond a doubt who "Primrose" and "Eleanora" and "Eloise" were. I was mortified—delighted—but,, mortified of the duty, I was more than that—I was triumphant!

Hastily wrote and despatched the following note to Fred

DEAR OLD FELLOW.—I have just come—that is, I have just found out the author of your letters. Come to me in an hour, for a few moments only, and I will put right depend upon it. Keep firm, and be at my office again at four P. M.

GLENARM.

CHAPTER II.

THE END.

What a blessing our modern system of railroading is! An hour later I was sitting in the study library at Rosemount—my uncle Raleigh's country residence, ten miles out of town—my three pretty cousins, Lulu, Bess and Amy, forming around me an admiring circle. I had taken them quite by surprise by this visit, and they fluttered around me in a delightful way, saucy, respectful, and affectionate by turns, as is their usual custom with their cousin Charlie.

As to me, I was charming! Brilliant, nonsensical, entertaining, I rattled away at a fearful rate, telling them all the little items of city gossip I could think of. They were in the city, driving, calling and shopping almost every day, and, consequently, knew pretty much all that was going on there; so, of course, they appreciated my gossip immensely.

"And oh, girls, by the way," I went on, in a wonderfully animating way, "I must tell you about the elegant joke some man has got off on Fred Percival—you've noticed him at Trudhol & Co., haven't you?"

"Oh, yes, yes, we know," was the laughing response, while a glance of intelligence passed like lightning from one to another of the trio.

Affecting not to notice this, I went on:

"Of course, you have;" he is generally pretty numerous, I believe, and makes it a point to see and be seen by every pretty girl who goes there. Well, a day or two ago he got three letters, from as many different young ladies, purporting to be answers to his proposals of marriage,—two of them containing a positive acceptance; and now he's in an elegant fix, and half angry over it all, for he swears he never wrote to one of them in his life."

The time a suppressed giggle went round the circle; and my fair auditors, apparently sufficented with their suppressed merriment, seemed singularly excited over my narrative. Still affecting to see nothing, I proceed, in a confidential tone:—

"Of course, girls, I ought not to have mentioned this, because I am in poor Fred's confidence, and he would feel awfully cut up, if he thought the joke would get out. But I thought I must tell you, for I knew you would enjoy the lark."

This was my master-stroke, and I assure you, dear reader, it had a telling effect.

"Look ye, girls,—let's tell cousin Charlie all about it," exclaim-d Lulu, in an aside, to which the others too laughingly assented.

"What's that?" I demanded, getting up an expression of countenance intended to represent a newly awakened suspicion.

"Why you see, Charlie," began Lulu, as spokesman, "we've flirted awfully with Fred Percival, and it was just so end of fun, for he paid us the greatest flirt you ever saw; and you know we were just dying for some fun and excitement, so Bess proposed that we should each write a letter to Mr. Percival, signed with a fictitious name,—and signed fictitious name. So we put our heads together and agreed to write just as if he had written to each of us, making an offer of marriage, and we would each accept—all we girls—knowing that, just for variety, she would do the broken-hearted style, and say "No." Bess took the role of an old maid, while I was a very gushing, passionate one, and Amy took the middle ground. Now, you know, if he was true to me, or to shoot him if he was not! Well, we got them all written, just for the fun of it, and hadn't an idea, at first, of carrying it any further; but we thought the joke such a rich joke on him, that we couldn't resist the temptation to send them. We mailed them in the city, two days ago,—and we dared to go ourselves to the post-office, lest, if Fred he suspects us, or has found us out. Oh, you ought to have seen those letters, Charlie! You would have killed yourself over them, I know!"

"Well, Miss Lulu, I have seen those identical letters—in fact have them in my possession at this very moment—and, as you will perceive, I still survive," I remarked on this point.

"You, Charlie? How did you get them?" cried the young ladies, making a rush at me.

"Honorably enough—Fred gave them to me," I answered, waving my cousins off, and looking up at them with the air of a man who has at last got everything into his hands. "Now, girls, listen. Fred is no trifler, in such a serious affair, I feel sure; he 'an elegant flirt,' he is determined to have legal redress, and he has put the whole affair into my hands. I, as a lawyer, am bound to do every thing I can for my client; and, putting aside all merely personal feeling, I shall make it my business to undo, as far as possible, all the mischief that you silly girls have done."

I saw that my audience were getting frightened. There were unmistakable indications of that. Still, they were not yet as thoroughly alarmed as I wished to see them; so I resumed, unctuously:

"Though you are probably not aware of the fact, my friend Percival was not at all a proper subject for such a practical joke."

"Why?" breathlessly.

"Because he is a married man!"

During the rhetorical pause which followed this astonishing reply, I distinctly heard my own watch faintly tick-ticking—the only sound in the room. Surprise, chagrin, consternation, held my senses spellbound. I followed up my advantage.

"These letters, arriving in his absence, were opened by Mrs. Percival. Imagine, if you can, her astonishment on reading letters, addressed to her husband! Imagine, also, the fearfully false position in which Fred was placed, in her eyes. Young Mrs. Percival is a lady of spirit and determination; also, quick tempered. She would listen to none of poor Fred's protestations of innocence—she would not believe him when he swore that he had no complicity in the matter—knew nothing about it. After a high-tragic scene, she left him, declaring that she never wanted to see him again; and she took with her, from her father's, firmly believing that her husband was a gay deceiver, and breaking her poor little heart over it, no doubt, notwithstanding her anger. Poor Fred is almost distracted, for, although he knows he is innocent, he sees no way of proving his innocence to the satisfaction of Madame. Thus you see the wrong that you have done him,—the trouble into which your silly, practical joke has plunged him."

My fair auditors stood in petrified silence, pale, agitated, very much alarmed at these unexpected revelations. My sudden change, from the gay, confidential manner by which I had entrapped them into a confession, to the present stern, judicial bearing, fell upon them like a thunder-clap.

Lulu was first to recover herself.

"Well!" she exclaimed indignantly, "I don't care two straws! If Fred Percival is a married man, he deserves to be shot, and I don't care one bit for it!" He flirts shamefully, and he deserves every bit of the punishment we have served him out with!"

"And, I, too!" Miss Lulu, I returned, with a sardonic smile. "She will become reconciled to him, return home, and life will go on as peacefully as before. I shall see to that."

"How, pray?" inquired my cousins.

"I will demonstrate. Have you writing materials handy? Bring them to my side, Lulu's writing-desk was near at hand. She mentioned mechanically to—

"Very good!" and I brought the desk, and placed it before her.

"Well?" she inquired, trying to conceal her trepidation by an assumption of fancies which amused me mightily, though my long contained mirth could not last.

"You will please produce paper, pen and ink, and write, in as brief and straightforward a manner as possible, a confession that this affair was all a hoax, completely exonerating Mr. Percival from all share or complicity in the matter."

Lulu's dark eyes flashed.

"Indeed, cousin Charles, I will do nothing of the sort!" she began, indignantly; whereupon I instantly arose and bowed.

"Very good!" I said. "If you are determined not to comply with this request, I will not urge it. I shall return to the city without delay. This is a matter of business, and I must be dealt with in a business-like manner. Hold yourselves in readiness, young ladies, for whatever may occur; remember, you are at any moment liable to arrest, on a charge of conspiracy! Good afternoon."

So thunder-struck were the young ladies, at these words, that I had scarcely left the room, when I heard a sudden rush behind me, before one of them could find voice to speak. Then Lulu gave one frantic cry, "Stop! Wait!" I stopped—I waited. Whirling round, I saw Lulu taking out her writing materials with extraordinary expedition, while Bess and Amy, hovering near, were urging her, in an excited whisper, to hasten. The light almost convulsed me; but, after standing for about three minutes in the recess of a distant bay-window, she like, by the heavy flowing drapery, apparently studying the landscape, I was able to command myself sufficiently to resign them with a countenance as grave and stern as ever.

After writing out the confession, Lulu handed it to me. I glanced over it, nodded, then nodded my head approvingly.

"All right," I said, placing it on the desk again. "Now, I must request you all to endorse it with your signatures. Write simply 'Primrose,' 'Eleanora,' and 'Eloise.' Then, as I noticed a sad smile, and commenced to slowly pace the floor, I murmured, as if to myself, though I was careful that they should over-hear me:

"I think gentlemen—who will once a legal prosecution!"

The confession was ready at last, duly signed; then, taking up Lulu's pen, I wrote, underneath the signatures, in my bold, business-like hand, those impressive sentences:

This is to certify that, on this day, the 21st of October, A. D. 18—, personally appeared before me, Charles Glenarm, Attorney at Law, and Prosecuting Attorney for Dade Co., Ohio, Primrose, Eleanora, and Eloise, Lulu, Bess and Eloise, who, I am satisfied, are the perpetrators of the hoax, herein described. And I, fully persuaded of the truth of this confession, and the identity of the said Primrose, Eleanora and Eloise, do hereby, in consideration of the fair, absolute documentary proof, in my possession, of the total and entire innocence of Mr. Frederick Percival, recommend most heartily a complete restoration of the confidence and affection, between this most cruel and unnatural feud, to be lost.

In witness hereof I do hereby append my name and official seal.

Signed, CHARLES GLENARM,
Attorney at Law, M. C. Dade, etc., etc.

"There!" I exclaimed, when, after sealing this with a grand flourish, I folded the important document, and put it carefully into my pocket. That will adjust the difficulty. When Mrs. Percival is once fully convinced of Fred's innocence, she will graciously forgive him for unjust suspicions, come, like a dear, sensible little woman, and resolve to trust in him, in future, come what may. Bless my cousins, I'm off," I added, starting up, "or I shall miss the 7:30 train to the city. Time is precious, while Fred is still in suspense."

"Oh, Charlie!" and as my name was uttered, I found myself the center of an affecting tableau,—my three cousins clinging to me with all the energy of despair. "Promise that you will never tell anyone that we did it! Won't you promise, Charlie? Will you promise?"

Disengaging myself and I straightened up, in all my dignity, and looked down upon them from my imposing height. "Girls, I am a nobleman! Nobleman

The Saturday Evening Post
PHILADELPHIA
FOUNDED AUG. 4, A.D. 1821

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

With Premiums.

For $2.50, the Post one year and Mounted Chromo, "De Soto and the Discovery of the Mississippi."
For $3.50, the Post one year and Unmounted Chromo.
For $1.50, the Post 6 months and Mounted Chromo.
For $1.25, the Post six months and Unmounted Chromo.

Without Premiums.

For $2.00, the Post for One Year.
For $1.00, the Post Six Months.

CLUB RATES.

Four Copies, one year, $7.00.
Six Copies, one year, $10.00.
Ten Copies, one year, $15.00.
Twenty Copies, one year, $25.00.

An extra copy free to any one getting up a club of ten or more.

Subscriptions can begin or additions be made to clubs at any time.

In all the above cases, postage will be paid by the publishers.

RATES OF ADVERTISING.

Payable in Advance.

Fifty cents per line of space. Agate measurement, for each insertion.
SPECIAL NOTICES, 75 cents per line.
READING NOTICES, $1.00 per line.
Address all orders and make all drafts payable to
BENNETT & FISCH,
702 MARBLE STREET,
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Saturday Evening, December 2, 1876.

A NEW FEATURE

GOOD BOOKS FOR ALL!

The Best Reading Brought Within Your Reach.

As new books are announced from time to time, thousands would gladly read them, but the cost is too great. Indeed the majority cannot afford to buy one-half the publications which they could read with pleasure and profit.

We desire to bring within the reach of thousands of such families the best literature of the day, and make a beginning in that direction in the plan described below. If there be the co-operation we desire and expect, its facilities will be extended from time to time, until every reader of this paper shall have the whole field of literature and science made easily attainable.

As a beginning we have selected from the books of the leading publishers one hundred of the best works of standard writers. The list of these will be published in a succeeding number of the Post. As many duplicates of each of these hundreds as shall be needed, will be provided. To these additions are to be made from time to time, until it embraces a complete collection of the books the people want to read.

The library then founded is to be for the benefit of the subscribers to the SATURDAY EVENING POST.

For the present the following offer is made. To any one now a subscriber to this paper, who will send us the names of four new subscribers, with the subscription price ($2) for each, we will give the reading of any ten books he may select from our library during the year. We will send the books, one at a time, post-paid by mail, allow one month for their perusal, at the end of which time they are to be returned to us, for the benefit of others.

We will give the privilege of drawing ten books for each four new subscribers sent as above. There are few neighborhoods where at least four subscribers cannot be obtained with a little effort, and in many cases a person can by getting twelve or sixteen subscribers, command the use of thirty to forty of the best books during the year.

We shall not object to the inducement being used in getting your four new subscribers, that you will allow them to share in the reading of the books, provided only that they be returned to us in good order. We desire that the use of our facilities be as wide as possible, and that as many as possible shall be benefited thereby.

This is a special and distinct offer, separate from the clubbing terms offered in another place. Those who prefer can still have the privilege of clubbing to secure the lower subscription rates there offered as an inducement—the margin is too low to allow the library privilege except for full subscription rates.

Now then, we ask that the work of canvassing in every neighborhood be actively commenced. We are assured by hundreds of letters that the old Post was never better, and that it can be conscientiously recommended to your friends. The books offered for selection will be of the best, and we confidently expect thousands will enjoy their reading.

PENNSYLVANIA has hung more murderers than any other State. It is the Hempen State.—Graphic. Such jokes as that are a nuisance.—Philadelphia Bulletin. We had intended to add one, but after a moment's reflection concluded to gibbet it.—Norristown Herald. We contribute our drop and expect to see more necks twisted.

THE WAY TO EDUCATE.

Doing a thing gives power to do it easier and better. These few words express the reason for and the way of education, and they ought to be indelibly fixed in the mind of every teacher and pupil. The illustration of their truth may be seen in every art and calling. Notice the boy learning to write. He is not expected to master pronunciation by listening to lectures. He takes a pen and begins. What work he makes of it. His untrained muscles refuse to move where his eye would guide them; his nervous efforts to control them are ludicrous. Almost every part of his body seems to sympathize with his strenuous efforts; his head is drawn to one side, his tongue thrust out and seems to be trying to trace the forms of the letters with its tip, and the letters look as though they might have been made with the pen held in his mouth. But day by day the task grows easier; the hand learns to obey the guidance of the eye and the thought, and ere long almost without attention, mechanically as we say, the well formed letters follow the rapid tracing of the pen.

The skillful stroke of the blacksmith with his hammer; of the sculptor with his chisel; the astounding feats of the trained athlete; the critical ear of the musician, and the delicate taste of the connoisseur in wines, all tell the same story. Excellence has been attained by repetition, by constant practice, until the requisite organs seem to move of themselves, and habit forms second nature.

These obvious truths seem to be strangely overlooked in much of the educational training of the day. Children are set to commit tasks to memory from books, and by practice they acquire marvelous facility in repeating words. If this is to be their calling in life; if they are to be great rememberers of what others have written, the right course is pursued. But merely knowing what others think is of little account, unless one knows how to think for himself and so to use the materials which others have gathered. The blacksmith may fill his shops with tools and patterns, and yet be only a botch of a mechanic. The English farmer hit the nail on the head when to reply to a man who boasted of his superiority because he had graduated at two universities he said, "I had a calf that sucked two cows, but it only made him a bigger calf."

Training in observation and reasoning unalone give skill and power in using the perceptive and reasoning faculties. A ten minutes familiar talk with a child on a subject in which he will become interested to investigate for himself, will be more valuable than hours devoted to memorizing words about the matter. In active life success depends largely upon ability to detect facts, compare them and draw conclusions, and he only is a skillful teacher who knows how to arrange the tasks of a child so that he shall be brought to follow this method, and exercise it regularly.

THANKSGIVING.

The old New England festival of Thanksgiving has happily become a national institution, and the day for its observance is designated by the President. To those who passed their childhood in the New England States, it brings some of the happiest memories of life. Holidays were few there. The old puritanical spirit which looked upon joyousness and mirth as nearly allied to wickedness, cast its severity over most of the year. But under this sombre exterior, the brighter elements of character were only hidden, not destroyed, and when their creed sanctioned and enjoined the expression of gladness, it beamed forth with all the greater lustre because of the habitual repression. The whole land rejoiced together and all that could add to the fullness of pleasure was liberally brought forth.

Who can describe the mutual happiness of parents and children, brothers and sisters, all assembled again under the old roof-tree perhaps for the only time during the year. The beautiful feast that had for weeks filled the imagination of the youngsters now disappointed only because they could not hold more! And then the games, the frolics, when all joined and the old became young again. If there is less heartiness than formerly in the celebration of the day, it is because such occasions of indulgence in pleasure are more frequent, and the average of enjoyment is higher.

The time-honored custom has too strong a hold upon us not to be easily set aside. It would be a sad day for the nation, should a time ever come when all hearts should not willingly respond to an invitation to join in grateful expressions for the good brought by the passing year. Neglectful ingratitude can only find place where the decay of virtue has desolated the heart; a thankless people have advanced far toward ruin.

The suggestions of the day will bring pain to many hearts; remembrances of prosperity now lost and visions of loved ones now gone. Yet let such not give way to repining or refuse to recognize the hand of a loving Father whose mercies never fail, though we may not for a time be able to discern his loving hand. Let faith in Him bring peace if not gladness, and anticipations of reaping in joy what has been sown in tears.

THE training of children must begin with the very cradle to be perfect. The saying that man is a bundle of habits is as true of babies as it is of grown children.

THE political atmosphere is growing colder, and betting men generally seem to think it will stake-holder, too.—North American. In proof of this several pools are mentioned as being frozen too.

THE cute: the New York Tobacco Journal are not fine cuts.—N. O. Rep. Probably fine cuts would be chew expensive.—St. Louis Jour. If you fellows can "delicate" yourselves with such puns, why pipe away.—Norristown Herald. It's small to make one stick to see such quid-diffies.

ADOWN BY THE ORCHARD WALL.

BY E. A. ——

Adown by the mossy orchard wall
The white the perfumed rose-leaves fall
And the robin trills his merry song
Two lovers stroll: but what they say
Now you may hear and shall know to-day
For the boundless store
Of love's sweet lore
To robins and lassies will ever belong.

Be busy hands the meadows are strewn
With the fragrant billows of grass new-mown,
But still the robin pipes his lay
And listening now his mate is wait
Beside the slowly swinging gate.
For once they pause
Outside, alas!
Through workaday pains their feet must stray.

They are trying now life's blossoming hours,
When every walk is spread with flowers.
And never a day is fraught with care
Though feel may thorns and frown at will
Their happy hearts keep singing still Yonder is the time
For wedding chime
Love, love is sweet and the world is fair.

They never dream that youth must grow old
That the silver head must lose its gold
That bounding pulses must pass the time
That over the white and shapely hand
May stretch the cold, cold, and the shining band
And sadness of all
That one may fall
And leave the other to pine in memory.

Ah! happy, happy youthful pair
For world is sweet and life is fair
While you pass to the happy whispering lands
And when, and when, the sunset comes
Life's last, slow hill, may love still crown
Your overjoyed head
By the love led
Across earth's wearying, desert sands.

THE MYSTERY OF BALARAT.

BY CAPTAIN CARNES.

Six of us had found our way into the gold diggings of Balarat, six of us rather above the ordinary miner, in that we were neither convicts, gamblers, nor quarrelsome fellows. We chose a place remote from other crews who worked the more easterly claims, and found no incumbrances save a lone man who seemed to be a lounder, and whom at first we looked upon with distrust, until his generosity won upon our gratitude. Every day or two he came down to our camp with a brace of birds, or a haunch of kangaroo, and only with the greatest amount of urging could we get him to accept remuneration.

"What does it matter, boys?" he would say, rejoins at our sharing with game, and enough is enough. There is nowhere to sell it, and what should I want of money?"

He always repeated this last question with the bitterness intonation, or, at least, I get that impression on my mind. After some months of acquaintanceship we persuaded him to come into our mess, and urged upon him the expediency of his pairing with us.

"Make a fortune," Bence said.

"Make a fortune, Masters, and we'll return to the world and see the sights."

What a bald glee came into the man's eyes.

"Why should I?" Why should we?" The world don't make us—not in the least, only we are such bad cases that she is afraid of us, and then the mining is a happy sensation."

We could only guess at his history. He was well-literate, not ill-faced. Probably some disappointment in love or business, had soured his disposition, and made a misanthrope, or recluse, of him. It seemed that he gave up his old roaming life by inches; staying with us, 24 first, for a few days, and by and by for a week or two; then receiving it altogether, being absent from our mess and then a day at a time. His inseparable companion was an immense black bull-dog, and I half believe that we urged Masters to join us as much for the sake of the animal as his own. The brute was awake, snuffing about the cabin, outside and inside—although but seldom disturbing us in this way—his wakefulness usually meeting us of his watchfulness.

Masters was a fellow of Herculean proportions, swarthy almost as a mulatto, and the apathy that seemed to pervade his nature when we first found him in the desolate region of Balarat, soon gave way to an avaricious fire, which the others failed to notice, and which I was loth to mention, but I should prejudice some one against him.

After three months' labor each of us had accumulated a handsome deposit. Each one had his leathern pouch for holding the precious metal, and in a little cellar place in the cabin itself we had our treasures, until such time as the accumulated amount should warrant a journey to Melbourne.

One morning, just after breakfast, Masters jumped up and cried, exclaiming that he had been robbed. We all sprung up lively, only to make a like discovery. The pouches were mostly filled with sand, with a small quantity of gold on the top.

We looked at each other in baffled amazement, ejaculating "How? When? By whom?"

Our cabin was close by where we worked. No one could possibly have been near it, besides the huge watch-dog would not let a stranger approach the premises. For several days we had been in a detection, and also in all night, snuffing the air, going outside and coming in at will, for we felt safer with him by our bed-keeper than with all the bolts and bars in creation.

For several nights after that, Masters and Dick Bence watched just outside the door with rifles cocked in their hands, until I showed them the ridiculousness of the proceeding, by coming in, "being picked dead over empty pouches?" What an idea! As if the thief would return after the leather, boys.

They were considerably confused as they realized their misplaced zeal, and betook themselves to their couches like sensible men.

Some of us seemed to mind the trick that fortune had played us, excepting Masters. "It isn't any use to go on working—my old life is better," and although we tried to cut himself we could not move him. "What good is there in digging and then lose it all at once?"

"But," returned Digby, "we don't mean to lose it again; we will each one hide in a secret and separate place; then if one loses, the rest can make it up to him."

Master's swarthy face worked as he heard the generous fellow's plan, but in a moment he shook his head. He struggled off into the wilds, coming every few days with game, which he not unfrequently broiled for us, while we were digging up the dirt in the mines. The dog, for the most part, hung around the camp. If he started with his master he would soon return.

"I dare not have him along with me," Masters explained, "lest that he has got a safe home. He is too spirited. He would tackle a dozen of dingos, and at least his life."

"Isn't it about time for us to organize a picket guard?" asked Digby one evening at mealtime. "The devil may fly away with our wallets when they are half full, this time."

"Hardly," returned the boys, "the old fellow don't descend to petty larceny, as I have ever heard. Depend upon it, there is no danger until we find it a slippery job to tie the string. Why, what made you think of it?"

"Some sort of a jumbled up dream that I had last night," I remarked.

"All right! If you say picket, picket it is."

"Oh," said Brace, with a spice of malice, "Carnes is the fellow that perpetrated the joke concerning the sentineling of empty pouches, before, and now he proposes mounting guard on but little higher principles—they are not more than half filled now."

"Perhaps empty," vouchsafed another.

With this some one dove into their sale and shouted,

"I swan, its a clean sweep again."

"Impossible!" we all tried, rushing hither and you, and meeting five minutes later with blank faces and collapsed wallets. "This accounts for the strange actions of the dog last night. He wasn't quiet a moment, scuffling back and forth—and what does it all mean?" "Does it mean Masters?" Every one hadly disclaimed the idea."

"It is a relenting of the performance when is as well as ourselves lost his gold. "But why does not the dog make an outcry?"

"His early education, no doubt," you know Masters obtained him somehow of outlaws, and it is my opinion that that is the reason that he does not allow the animal to accompany him, lest he be recognized and kidnapped. Doubtless his original master could interpret his every movement, while we cannot."

"But how is the thing done?"

"It must be in the day time."

"No, I can take oath that my metal was safe last evening." Well, it couldn't be accomplished in the night, unless, indeed, the ominous noise caused each man to look at his neighbor.

"Let's have the whole thing, Digby," yelled Brace, flushing to the roots of his hair. "We don't want any insinuations coming to sit down with us. I swear, its disagreeable enough to work like a truck horse and the devil get the wages without a measure biting off a sentence in that nasty fashion."

Digby was hugely embarrassed at the unexpected and furious attack, but he managed to articulate.

"I didn't finish because, 'twas too ridiculous. I was going to say that it was beyond comprehension unless one of us were a sleep-walker."

"Never! I am guilty of the thing," each one affirmed of himself.

Well, we spent a whole day hunting for some clue to the mystery. With ideas of subterraneous passages we charged our picks into the holes where our gold had been, and buried about the camp for underground passages.

We found Ebenezer nothing but the tracks of the dog where he had been outside and down to the fork to drink.

Masters came in that night and advised us to leave that accursed locality; but we couldn't make our minds to do so, so long as the deposits continued to yield so richly.

"No," said Digby, in an aside to me, "Carnes, if I stay here at Balarat alone, I will remain until I solve this mystery."

I imbibed something of his spirit, besides I resolved to be doing a little spying on my own account; for it certainly must be one of our party, or the devil—that accomplished of these clever robberies.

We were filling up our wallets again, but with the determination if we lost again to consider the place the haunt of disembodied thieves.

It came about a wild, windy morning, finishing off with a noisy night. We had worked like mules all day, and I had the impression that Masters would bring us in a brace of fowls for supper, and sure enough he did, and roasted them for us. We sat down together and feasted like rather begrimmed, but mammoth sylvan fairy kings, while we mind, amidst all the uproarious laughter, and coarse but witty jokes, was settling into a fixed determined plan.

As the day departed, Masters shouldered his rifle and strode off. A little later, I strolled outside without saying anything to the boys of my intentions. By the greatest strategems I kept them in view. On and on, I kept dodging behind elevations, boulders, and evergreens, but the darkness was settling down heavily, and I should soon lose sight of him. The wind made such a howling and roar that I was in fear of my hearing approaching footsteps. I certainly never felt like a guilty sneak until on this occasion; to be following along after an open-hearted unsuspicious man in an overcoat manner, made me cringe at every fresh crackling of the bushes. What if he should discover me? What explanation could I offer?

We had left the barren ridge and were deeply in the wooden district adjoining, when I suddenly lost sight of him.

"A fool for my pains," I muttered, thinking of the disagreeable walk that I should have on my return.

While wandering about in the growth of evergreens I heard the sudden hush. I had heard voices—low, mumbling tones came to me. I placed my revolver handy and crept forward. I came upon a cunningly devised camp made of interlaced fern and branches, but nothing else was in sight. I had to admit the wind, nor show the lights within to anyone two yards away. A whining voice was remonstrating.

Masters was replying.

"Only this time, Harry, I swear it; and then you and I will return to the world, and make the world wish we were not in it."

At the mention of a detection, I drew closer yet and placed my eye to a small crevice. A miserable, nine-shapen boy with a wizened, old visage was crouched at Masters's feet, fondling the man's hands with all the fawning affection of a dumb animal, and Master's face had on that an expression which I had never seen before. It was idolatrous love, mingled with a fierce, devilish hate.

A moment later I saw more—a startling, unlooked for revelation, and creeping off a few yards from the camp I then rose to my feet and ran at a crazy speed back to where the boys were smoking and wondering at my strange absence.

"Is the dog here, Duncan?"

"He was a moment ago—you, there he is, snuffing about the path to the mines. But we have been into your pouches."

"I have made the strangest discovery, boys; but you have all got to take a solemn oath to do just as I say, or I will not reveal it."

They saw by my manner that it was something astounding, and after a little hesitation they agreed to my proposition.

"Will you agree to lose your gold again without a murmur, if we can not only discover the thief, but, hereafter be exempt from further depredations?"

A longer pause followed and then Duncan spoke out, "I will," and the others not to be outdone agreed also to do this.

"Under no pretenation are you to fire a shot."

"This is strange—is it delirium tremens, or hydrophobia, Carnes?"

"I am suffering from an attack of neither."

"Go ahead, old fellow," said Brace, "we'll agree to anything to make you happy."

"Thank you; you all are to feign sleep at the usual hour, and let the dog act as he may, you are to remember not to move a finger against him."

"Him?" Of course not."

"Oh, but it will take more moral courage to forbear than you imagine. Allow me to develop the case properly; and I rely upon your promises."

"Honor bright!" they all exclaimed.

For an hour or more we watched the dog trot out and in, and finally go snuffing towards the stream.

Soon after we camped down for the night, but not to sleep. Two hours more passed away, and then the dog came in as usual, with excited muzzle, sniffing at one sleeper, or prostrate sleeper, and another. He stepped over one or two of them and sat down; then he moved along over others and yawning, stretched himself for a doze. Every eye is alert but unconscious, although with different ideas. The boys waited for him to give some warning of the thief's approach; I watched for a different reason.

He did not sleep long. He walked carefully among and over the recumbent figures, occasionally gave his ears a slat, or shook himself; and once with his hind foot scratched his neck. No one can imagine my emotions as I watched. But I was losing patience, when the animal began to be more entreating. I am sure that there must have been extreme control placed upon the emotions of the boys as they saw this dog scientifically move away the obstructions from each cunning hiding-place about the cabin, and removing one pouch at a time, but contained with them in his mouth, and after being absent some ten minutes, return with the empty leather, and silently replace them, his white paws showing at the work, although it was darkness in the cabin, save where the open door let in the brilliant starlight. In turn, five pouches were thus emptied of their gold, and as he was passing me with the last one, I made a show of fright. I grappled the animal by the neck and yelled out—

"You devil! I am going to put a knife through you."

A wild, whining, guttural cry, with a human intonation, was the response, and the boys, horrified, called out—

"For the love of Heaven, Carnes, let go, it's the devil!"

I had let go, and the animal issuing a white pan almost into my face, fled with terrible yelps out into the night, and a human howl; and baying from the wilds returned the cry.

Then the boys dropped the door of the tent and buttoned it, with nervous haste, lighted a lamp, and with wild eyes and distracted mien looked one to the other.

I could not forbear a laugh so long as I held a solution to the mystery.

"Incredible!" aspirated Duncan, "that a dog could be trained to perform like that."

"Boys," said I, "that was no dog."

"I believe you," affirmed Brace, "it was the devil."

"No, not that; hear me explain;" and I told them of what I had seen in Master's camp. The miserable little short-legged, long-armed, mishapen boy, and the few words that passed between them, and the bringing forth of the dog skin with the white paws, an exact counterpart of the animal which we had regarded with such esteem.

"But don't insinuate, madam, that it was not the dog—our dog—which has committed the thefts?"

"Certainly it was not our dog, but the child boy, dressed in a dog's coat."

"But I can't understand," put in Duncan, "the real animal——"

"Would have starved with us and betrayed the infernally contrived trick, only by scent he knew of his master's approach, for of course he came close up with the boy, to protect him if need be, and our dog was devoured away until the rather was safe."

"But I swear," says Duncan, "who would have believed that under his friendly visits and confidence he was finding out our hiding-places?"

"And had the dog-boy sometimes with him to bear the details."

One or two of the boys came indignantly to their feet.

"Shall we let the rascal go scot free?"

"Boys, boys, remember your promise. He would not be taken alive, and is there one of us who would have his blood on our hands. No, no, I saw his face unmasked to-night in the evergreen camp. It was a mirror of hell. Somewhere and somehow he has been wronged in a way that would make assassins of any of us. Let him go, boys, let him go."

They let him go.

With daylight a crumpled bit of paper on the floor explained the uplifting of the pain, as the masked robber left the cabin. On it were scrawled these words:

I shall trouble your gold no more. I have enough and boys, will you charge me, remember how you loaned me palmed in every humility owing to the fact of being sent here, transported for life for my rival's crime, and to your simple good-heartedness you crossed me to action. Life, avarice and hope of revenge. I could not wait to earn the gold. I made it, but you are not losers. Why did you keep telling me of returning to the world? of letting the world know that I would be even with it? Boys, I was a man outraged beyond all precedent—an escaped convict, but no criminal, until the thirst for revenge, and speedy terrible revenge, made me a robber, a doubly accursed robber, in as much as Masters's part child. Now, I am on my way pang to leaving this accursed mound in the western waste. I beseeching your trust. Forgive me! Forgive me!

MASTERS.

"Can we?" asked Duncan, coughing huskily, as if he had half-an-allowed a ball.

"I can," I returned heartily.

We six, unconceitedly demonstrative, shook hands, and solemnly buttoned our doors of nights, and never mentioned the poor thief's name, only when we chanced to hear a shepherd's dog howl, we would glance over our pipes at each other and silently go on with our smoking.

CALIFORNIAN CHINESE.

One of the most curious of San Francisco's sights is the Chinese theatre. For a trifling sum you may enter the large hall which forms the theatre, and take your seat on a plain wooden bench in the pit or gallery. On the left, in the woman's gallery, in a double row of diminutive, almond-eyed girls, who chatter with far more animation than their male friends exhibit, as they stolidly smoke on their seats of observation. The stage is a platform without scenery or decoration, save large strips of red paper, inscribed in black characters, pasted against the wall. The actors, in costume, make entrances and exits through curtained doors, converse in disagreeable falsetto; perform in comedies more like pantomime than drama, wherein the ferocious farmers roll over and prosecute as they conduct deadly combats, and finally stab each other, or cut off the head of the traitor, with a cuddlesome untying of cords or unbinding of wires, which plainly reveal the tricks of mechanism. Indeed, there is no attempt whatever at illusion. Whatever the supercomparing get through using their hatchadores, or the warriors drop their spears, or the hero discards his false whiskers, or the dragon is divested of his head, the property-man, who has been smoking his pipe at the rear of the stage in company with two or three friends, comes lazily forward, picks up the articles, while the play is going on, and hangs them up on nails in full sight, or deposits them in a chest in the corner. The orchestra, which is in an alcove at the rear, never ceases playing. It consists chiefly of a pair of cymbals, and subsidiarily of a sort of tomtom, or wooden drum, a thin-toned banjo, and a horizontal bass viol, played by rubbing on the strings. The music received from these instruments seems to be symbolical, and would interest an admirer of Wagner. When it is at its loudest, in the terrific combats, a very little of it will go a great way to the uneducated ear. And when the prima donna comes forward and shrieks an air, in precisely the falsetto of a feline, it is time for the auditor to "fold his tent, like the Arabs, and silently steal away."

DR. SAMUEL JOHNSON.

BY WILLIAM H. JOHNSON.

Dr. Johnson, poor old, Johnson in the fullness of his fame and in the enjoyment of a competent fortune, is better known to us than any other man in history. Everything about him, his coat, his wig his figure, his face, his scrofula, his St. Vitus's dance, his rolling walk, his blinking eye, the outward signs which too clearly marked his approbation of his dinner, his insatiable appetite for fish-sauce and veal-pie with plums, his excruciatingly thirst for tea, his trick of touching the posts as he walked, his mysterious practice of treasuring up scraps of orange-peel, his morning prayers, his midnight disputations, his contortions, his mutterings, his grantings, his puffings, his vigorous, acute and ready eloquence, his sarcastic wit, his vehemence, his fits of temperament rage, his queer manners, old Mr. Lewis and blind Mrs. Williams, the cat Hodge, and the negro Frank—all are as familiar to many as the objects by which they have been surrounded from childhood.

But we have no minute information respecting those years of Johnson's life during which his characters and his manners became immutably fixed. We know him not as he was known to the men of his own generation, but as he was known to men whose father he might have been. Boswell and Mrs. Thrale, the two writers from whom we derive most of our knowledge respecting him, never saw him till long after he was fifty years old, when most of his great works had become classical, and when the pension bestowed on him by Lord Bute had placed him above poverty. He went to London precisely at the time when the condition of a man of letters was most miserable and degraded. To lodge in a garret up four pair of stairs; to dine in a cellar among footmen out of place; to translate ten hours a day for the wages of a dinner; to be hunted by bailiffs from one haunt of beggary and pestilence to another, from "Grub street to St. George's Fields," and from "St. George's Fields to the alleys behind St. Martin's Church; to sleep on a bulk in June, and among the ashes of a glass-house in December; to die in an hospital and to be buried in a parish vault, was then the fate of more than one writer. Into calamities and difficulties, such as these Johnson plunged in his twenty-eighth year. From that time till he was fifty-two we have little information respecting him—little compared with the full and accurate information which we possess respecting his proceedings and habits toward the close of his life. He emerged at length from cockloftes and stagnant ordinaries into the society of the polished and the opulent. His fame was established. A pension sufficient for his wants had been conferred upon him, and he came forth to astonish a generation with which he had almost as little in common as with Frenchmen and Spaniards. From nature he had received an uncouth figure, a diseased constitution, and an irritable temper, and the roughness and violence which he showed in society were to be expected from a man who had been long tried by the bitterest calamities—by the want of meat, of fire and of clothes, by the importunity of creditors, by the insolence of booksellers, by the derision of fools, by the insincerity of patrons, by that bread which is the bitterest of all food, by those stairs which are the most toilsome of all paths, by that deferred hope which makes the heart sick. Through all these things the ill-formed, coarse, ungainly person had struggled manfully up to eminence and command. For severe distress he had sympathy, and not only sympathy, but munificent relief. He would rise from his bed to shoulders a sick and starving girl from the streets. He turned his house into a place of refuge for a crowd of wretched old creatures who could find no other asylum; nor could all their peculiarities and ingratitude weary out his benevolence.

The characteristic peculiarity of Johnson's intellect was the union of great power with low prejudices. Where he was not under the influence of some strange scruple, or some domineering passion, which prevented him from boldly and fairly investigating a subject, he was a wary and accurate reasoner a little too much inclined to skepticism, and a little too fond of paradox. The judgments which he passed on books were in his own time regarded with implicit reverence, and in our time are generally treated with indiscriminate contempt. On men and manners he looked with a most observant and penetrating eye. His remarks on the education of children, on marriage, on the economy of families, on the rules of society, are always striking and generally sound. But the reputation of those writings which he probably expected to be immortal is every day fading, while those peculiarities of manner and that careless table-talk, the memory of which he thought would die with him, are likely to be remembered as long as the English language is spoken in any quarter of the globe.

THE LONGEST DAYS.

At London and at Bremen, Prussia, the longest day has sixteen and a half hours; at Stockholm, in Sweden, the longest day has eighteen and a half hours; at Hamburg, in Germany, and Dantzic, in Prussia, the longest day has seventeen hours, and the shortest seven hours; at St. Petersburg, in Russia, and Tobolsk, in Siberia, the longest day has nineteen hours, and the shortest five hours; at Torneo, in Finland, the longest day has twenty-one hours and a half, and the shortest two hours and a half; at Wardhuys, in Norway, the day lasts from the 21st of May to the 23d of July, without interruption, and at Spitzbergen the longest day is three and a half months; at New York the longest day, June 18th, has fourteen hours and fifty-six minutes, and at Montreal fifteen and a half hours.

SELF-CONFIDENCE.—Men often lose opportunities by want of self-confidence. Double and fears in the minds of men for up for every event, and then fear to attempt what most probably will be successful though more timorsome, while a courageous, active man will, with perhaps half the ability, carry an enterprise to a prosperous termination.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

IN THE OLDEN TIME

By ANONYMOUS.

Would you talk of the love of the olden time,
When earth was freer from wrong and crime,
When faith was simple and hearts were warm,
To brave the tempest and face the storm;
When lovers met by the trysting tree,
When summer breezes came over the sea,
And the chattering birds on the leafy boughs
Would stop to listen to lovers' vows?

Do you think that the world was purer then?
Was there more of truth in the hearts of men?
Less love of power and lust of gain,
And less of sin to wither and stain?
Were the tender vows that lovers spoke,
Sooth the leafy shade of their trysting oak
To us olden time have a new meaning,
More strong in purpose, more sure to last?

Though the world grows old with its load of crime,
Though the simple faith of olden time,
Its earnest purpose, and quiet ways,
Are lost in the hurrying busy days,
Yet the glimpse of Eden love brings again
Will steer also brighten the hearts of men,
And whether the times to now or old,
The wonderful story will still be told.

JOSHUA HAGGARD'S DAUGHTER.

By Miss M. E. BRADDON,

Author of "Lady Audley's Secret," etc.

(This story was commenced in No. 34, Vol. 55. Back numbers can always be obtained.)

CHAPTER XXXVI.

JOSHUA STOPS HIS WATCH.

Little Bethel was crammed to suffocation on the Sunday that followed the burial of Oswald Pentreath. Not only had the flock assembled in fullest force to hear their pastor improve the occasion, and collage upon the evil that had been wrought against him by the Philistine, but many who were not of Joshua's sect had been drawn to his tabernacle by curiosity. They wanted to see how the man would bear himself under circumstances so trying to manly fortitude.

The flock were not disappointed in the demeanor of their minister. Never had Joshua conducted his simple service with greater dignity. His prayers, these eloquent extemporaneous outpourings, modeled upon the theology of William Law, yet with something of Jeremy Taylor's floral warmth in their coloring, carried his congregation along with him like resistless waters down which a fleet of frail boats are driven tumultuously, knowing not whither they drift. It was by his eloquence in prayer chiefly that Joshua had established his power over his flock. He lavished his best souls by his own enthusiasm; they felt themselves raised to a spiritual height, which of themselves alone they could never have obtained. They heard their cares and sorrows, their petty doubts and difficulties, their failures and shortcomings and evil acts, laid at the foot of the great throne, with such appeals for pardon and pity as their dull minds could never frame, their unelegant phrase never utter. Joshua took them up in his arms, as it were, and held them at the feet of their Saviour, and called down the eternal mercy for them. He used the Scriptures, for their benefit, as a skilful barrister uses precedents for the extrication of his clients. He found bounteous promises that they had never dreamed of in those familiar words of Holy Writ, covenants and pledges of grace and mercy. He held a golden key, with which he opened the treasury of Heaven, and brought forth promises and favors for his people.

To-day his prayers took a tone of deepest self-humiliation. He laid himself prostrate before offended Heaven, and there was none of the exultant pride which the flock expected to discover in his supplications, no thanksgiving for an unsullied conscience and a soul clear of offence, for rectitude which could laugh to scorn the revilings of the evil-minded. It was the publican, and not the Pharisee, who stood up to pray in that rural temple.

The hymn he chose was of a gloomy cast; but all his ministrations had of late been of a gloomy character. When he went up into the pulpit, and looked round at the upturned faces, and slowly opened his Bible there was a hush of expectancy. It was thought that his text would have some bearing on the strange event of the past week, and that in his sermon he would take occasion publicly to declare the falsehood and iniquity of the charge that had been brought against him.

But when he had given out the text, with his usual deliberate distinctness, there was a general sense of disappointment; the verses he had chosen were so little bearing on the subject which filled the public mind.

"In those days they shall say no more, The fathers have eaten a sour grape, and the children's teeth are set on edge. But every one shall die for his own iniquity."

Only Naomi understood the meaning of those words of assurance. For each the burden of his own sin; the assurance of innocent children were to have no portion in the shame and agony of his guilt. Upon this text Joshua Haggard enlarged with more than his accustomed power. Very awful was the picture which he painted of the sinner's earthly doom, the slow agonies of conscience, the shameful shrinking from the face of his fellowmen, the assumed innocent children stinging him like the sting of serpents, the reverence and obedience of his household a mockery and a reproach—the light of day intolerable, the sun a burden, the quiet night unrest, the grave a place from this picture of the sinner's suffering on earth he turned to the contemplation of his punishment hereafter, the vision assumed a darker and more terrible aspect. Before the Titanic tortures of that land of shadows, earth's puny torments shrunk to the sting of buzzing summer flies, as measured against the venom of the cobra or the rattlesnake. Joshua conjured up those visions of horror with a strange uncanny power, as if the fend had lifted the corner of hell's curtain, and showed him the fiery gulf beloiled. He dwelt on these terrors with a gloomy relish, and spoke of hell and doom with a familiar knowledge, as if he had stepped his soul in the fires of Pandemonium.

Coming out of church, amidst the crowd, Naomi found herself close to a stranger who was talking of her father.

"I can believe anything of this man, now I've heard him preach," he said.

"Why?" inquired his companion.

"Because I am very sure he is a madman."

"I don't see that," said the other, startled by the assertion. "His sermon was violent and gloomy, but sane enough.

"No sane man ever preached as that man preaches, and you may take my word for it."

Here the crowd parted Naomi from the speaker; but what she had heard impressed her deeply. It was hardly a new thought which was then abruptly presented to her. The change in her father had inspired her with fears, to which she had hardly dared to give their actual form. Who was to discriminate between perpetual gloom, moody silence, an unbroken reserve, and the inborn and indications of a mind distraught? That her father's whole character had undergone an alteration since the day of Oswald Pentreath's disappearance, she well knew. Was it not possible that, on that day the clear light of reason was darkened forever? From that fatal hour he had broken loose from all old ties—from children and wife, and friends and business—he had been like an owl of the desert, a pelican in the wilderness.

But even with the horror of the thought there came a blessed sense of relief. If reason had left him to the hour of temptation, if light was quenched before he did that fatal deed, her father was not accountable for his sin. It was not with his whole mind that he had broken the divine law. The clouded brain had not taken the measure of the act.

This offered a way out of her deepest sorrow. Dreadful as earthly penalties might be—shameful, unbearable, revolting—it was Heaven's anger she most dreaded for the father she wholeheartedly loved. Sure of God's pardon and pity for the sinner, she could see him perish on the scaffold with only earthly sorrow, with only sense of earthly suffering and loss; secure of a fair hereafter, a glorious meeting in a land of rest and peacefulness, where the red robes of repentant sinners were to be washed whiter than snow.

Awful, then, as the thought of mental alienation was, it was the comfort to her. She could cling closer to her afflicted father, pitying and pardoning him, full of remorse for her own share in his suffering, ascribing to herself half his guilt.

"If I had but spared him the knowledge of that letter, Heaven might have spared me this anguish," she thought.

Joshua was absent from the family board at the two o'clock Sunday dinner—an uninteresting repast of cold provisions, which James Haggard regarded as one of the penalties and trials of his career. Other people in Combholme rioted in hot joints and savory potatoes, reeking with unctious grease and gravy, followed by huge fruit pies or pastry, and, perchance, a bowl of cream.

"I don't call it honoring the Sabbath to sit down to a worse dinner than on a workday," Jim remarked, argumentatively. "And all that Sally may sit in a corner of our pew and breathe hard all through the sermon."

"Eat your dinner, and be thankful," said Aunt Judith, severely; "or leave it, and hold your tongue. I wonder you can be so base-minded as to think of your meals at such a time, with such affliction come upon your house as we've had to bear."

"Do you mean Captain Pentreath bringing the charge against Father?" asked Jim, contemptuously. "I'm not such a fool as to fret about that. Any lunatic might accuse us of murder, or arson, or high treason, or gunpowder plot. Poor Pentreath's head's been turned by finding his brother at the bottom of Matchely mine. I was over at The First and Last when the inquest was going on, and heard everybody saying it was worse than mutiny to lay such a crime to father's door. There's not a man in Combholme would believe a word against father."

"It would be hard if they would," retorted Judith, "after the life your father has lived among 'em all these years, and no one able to bring a reproach against him, unless it was for foolishness in marrying a silly girl for the sake of her pretty face."

"I never was silly about Cynthia," said Jim; "and for my part I wish she was home again. I miss her pretty face, though it was and enough for the last twelve months, goodness knows. I don't think we any of us made her too happy."

"She's a deal better away," replied Judith, with a sour look. "She turned your father's thoughts from his duties, and never brought anything but trouble into this house. Let her stop with friends of her own station, if she has any."

"Ain't it rather like turning her out-of-doors to let her stop away so long?" asked Jim.

"I didn't know it was a son's place to find fault with his father's doings," said Judith.

"Your father's the best judge of his duty to his wife, I should hope. It isn't for us to interfere. He didn't ask our leave when he brought her home, and it's not likely he'd want our leave to send her away."

"It's a pity things couldn't go smoother, anyhow," persisted Jim, persistently; "for she's a pretty little thing, and a good little thing, that would never do harm to any one."

"That's all you know, Mr. Clever. Perhaps you'll be kind enough to keep your opinion till you're asked for it. Why don't you cut your dinner, Naomi?" inquired Miss Haggard, sharply. "It's good, I'm sure, if beef as ever was cooked, and I suppose you're not too dainty to eat cold meat on the Sabbath."

"I'm not hungry, Aunt," said Naomi.

She had been sitting with her plate before her, making no attempt to eat, hearing her aunt and brother talking, but in no wise understanding them. Her thoughts were with her father in his lonely room. He had pleaded a headache, and gone quietly up to his bed-chamber when he came in from chapel. How was he bearing his burden? Without consolation, without sympathy? Yes, verily without human sympathy; but for this believer, even in his depth of guilty despair, there still remained a pitying Eye that would listen to his groaning, and take account of his anguish. The Friend of sinners would not be deaf to his cry.

"I think I'll go upstairs, and see how father is, and if he wants anything," said Naomi, rising from her untouched meal.

"If I was you, I wouldn't go bothering and disturbing him," said Judith, with her accustomed tartness; "but of course you can do as you like about it."

This was an indirect order not to go; but, for once in her life, Naomi disobeyed, and went straight to Joshua's room.

She knocked, but there was no answer, and she went in quietly, hoping to find her father asleep.

He was sitting in front of the open escritoire, his arms folded, his eyes bent upon the ground. His face was pale, drawn up at his daughter's entrance, nor even when she came close to him and laid her hand gently on his shoulder.

She stood for a few moments in silence, waiting for him to take some notice of her; but he sat like a statue, and never lifted his eyes from the ground.

"Dear father," she began, in a low and tender voice, as she would have spoken to him had he been lying ill at death's door, "I was obliged to come to you. I could not bear to think of you alone and unhappy. Dearest, it is a heavy affliction that has fallen upon us, but no heavier than we can bear. Father," sinking on her knees beside his chair, and pressing her arms round him, "if your guilt is deep, I am guilty too. I sinned grievously when I gave you his letter. I suffered my evil passion to get the better of me. My heart was full of hatred and rancour. Let us repent, and seek for mercy together. We both have sinned."

"The letter," muttered Joshua, with a bitter laugh, "the letter was not so much. I saw him hold her in his arms and kiss her—saw her yield herself up to a love that was stronger than honour, or duty, or her love to God—saw her foiled to his heart under Heaven's all-seeing eye."

"It was my fault, father. But for that letter you would never have known of that last meeting. It was but a stolen farewell, and they both meant to do their duty. They were so young, and had erred for want of thought."

"They were thoughtful enough to plan secret meetings—thoughtful enough to deceive me. And I believed her purest among women—free from all taint of sin. Do not speak of her—or of him. They sinned, and have reaped the fruit of sin. 'The wages of sin is death.'"

"Father, we have sinned grievously, you and I" and we can have no hope of mercy unless we repent," said Naomi, horrified at Joshua's hardness of tone, which implied an unconsciousness of the weight and measure of his crime.

"My life has been one long abomination. I have labored always in the work of salvation."

"But no one sinful act all might be undone—one dark hour in the life of a lifetime might be lost," urged Naomi.

Her father made no answer.

"Dearest, will you not kneel and pray with me?" she pleaded. "Will you not help me to lift this burden from my soul? I am weary with the weight of my sin. I loved him, and yet betrayed him to you. Oh, it was the dark hour of his life! He must have loved his Master. It was poison that made him a traitor. Father, if you cannot be sorry for your sin, be sorry for mine."

In vain; the brooding eyes were never lifted from the ground. Naomi looked up into the rigid face. Yes, there was an expression of pain, of deep humiliation, but it was a temporary aberration. He was not listening, he was not following her.

He sat for some time thus, Naomi still kneeling beside him, watching him, but in silence. Then he stretched out his hand to the open Bible that lay upon his desk, and began to read.

"Leave me, my dear," he said, "I am better alone."

"I would so much rather stay with you, dear father. I will not disturb you."

"Go, dear, I wish to be alone. I have to commune with my God. It will be time for chapel presently."

"I will go, then, dear father. But, while we are alone, let me say one thing."

"I am listening."

She put her arms round his neck, and rested her head on his shoulder.

"You know how I loved Oswald, father, to the last, even after his heart had gone away from me. But I told you then, as I tell you now, you were always first and dearest, always the object of my highest reverence and love. That could never change in a lifetime. I could lessen my love, no affliction Heaven could bring upon you could lower you in my esteem. Remember that always, father. Come what may, I am your loving daughter to the end."

With this assurance she left him, a little more at peace with herself for having thus spoken.

The afternoon service was gone through very quietly. Joshua had a subdued and weary air, as if worn out by the effort of the morning. The congregation was less alert and exhilarated than usual, and many persons in people who had dined heavily, and given way to fleshly snores in the shape of too substantial pastry. Even the hymns had a slumbering tone, and acted as lullabies upon drowsy slumberers of the flock whose feeble knees were an excuse for a sitting posture.

After service, Joshua taught for half an hour in his school, and made a few earnest words to the young men of his adult night-school, a class in which he had taken a special interest. They were very touching words, and well remembered afterward.

Joshua was absent from the tea-table, as he had been from the dinner-table. His headache was worse, he told his sister, and he was going to lie down. Naomi had an evening Scripture class to attend after tea, a task that would occupy her for about an hour. She went to this duty at half-past six o'clock, while Judith enjoyed the one Sabbath luxury which she permitted herself, a half-hour's nap in the chintz-covered armchair by the best-parlor windows, screened from the gaze of passing pedestrians, going by at the rate of one in ten minutes, by the graceful droop of the well-starched curtains.

Joshua was alone, sitting by the escritoire, as he had sat when Naomi went to him in his bedchamber. He had locked the door, determined to be free from all intrusion—free even from his daughter's pitying love. He wanted nothing between him and that awful solitude in which he had lived of late—the solitude in which a mind unhinged makes for itself.

He sat thus till the twilight thickened, and the pages of his open Bible grew dim. Even in that twilight gloom of his brain—a trouble which had been growing for months—that book was his rock of defense, his sheet-anchor. He looked into those pages for just direction, for assurance of grace and compassion, and he seemed to hear in vain. If he had sinned, had not David sinned also, and yet retained his exalted place in the love of God and men? Was he to humble himself more than David humbled himself? Had David ever ceased to be king and priest and teacher, chief and supreme among the people? If he had fallen, had not Peter also fallen, and yet received that divine commission, which gave him charge of Christ's flock?

"I will preach the Gospel, and teach men while I have breath," protested Joshua, laying his hand on the open book. "What have the burdens on my conscience to do with my teaching? What does it matter that I know myself a sinner, if I can exhort others to the love of God? He has given me a gift, and I will use it—to the uttermost and to the last. If this is to be a hypocrite, my hypocrisy shall go with me to my grave."

This was the summing-up of his position in one of his calmer moods; but his mind was not always so clear, or his views so fixed and resolute. There were moments when he sat in the gloomy twilight, with the shadows grew and deepened in the lonely, old-fashioned room, grotesque shadows of familiar things which he had known from childhood upward, there were intervals in which his brain grew clouded, the past and present were alike dim and distorted. His thoughts flashed far and wide, like the erratic gleams of a lantern—now alighting upon some picture of the past, now plunging into the dark gulf of the future. He saw himself as he had been at the outset of his laborious career—eager for self-sacrifice, careless of all worldly loss, sustained by an enthusiast's exaggerated hopes, and an enthusiast's indifference to suffering. He had labored, and had been plentifully rewarded. He had been a wandering light, shining in dark places and forgotten corners of the earth, and had brought many lost sheep home to the fold. Then his father had died, and he had been called back to his native place, to find that, after all, he had lost nothing of earthly gain by his constancy, for, despite the old man's threatenings, he had left all to his only son.

This day of inheritance Joshua in temptation had been in some measure a time of temptation and falling away. He had turned aside from the desert and desolate places, to dwell in a land of fatness. He had been content to serve a few instead of serving many. He had sat down under his vine and fig-tree, and taught one little flock, instead of wandering from village to village seeking those whom the church had forgotten, or cared for with a luke-warm love. True that he had labored hard for his flock, walked many miles, stretched his care of souls to its utmost limits, taught the young, brought the light of education, both spiritual and secular, into many dark places; but he had from this time ceased to be a stranger and a pilgrim upon earth, a disciple who has given up all things for his master.

Then came his prosperous first marriage, the birth of his children; new ties that bound him to the old home.

How strange and remote these early years seemed, as the fitful light of memory shone upon them!

The picture changed. Those peaceful, monotonous days were past. He was standing on the Cornish common in the pure sunshine, the great Atlantic glittering in the distance, the sandy knolls and hollows all ablaze with yellow furze, the subtle scent of that golden blossom in the air—standing on the threshold of a cottage door. Never, after that hour, was he to be the same man, independent of all human influence. Henceforth he was to be chained to humanity by mankind's most potent weakness—an unreasoning love for a weak fellow-creature.

"I really believe I loved her from that first day," he thought. "Her image never left me. She was always before me sitting in the sunlight, with her dark eyes and her pale gold. Can I doubt that Satan set her there for my entanglement and ruin? His heart shall be broken for her sake, he shall be astonished to be shaft from the hand of the fiend. But I have cheated him of his prey. He has had my heart, and bruised and broken it; but he has not questioned my spirit, he has not allowed my soul to bear my burden, and continued to bleed and exhaust, and will so continue to the end. No snare of the arch-tempter hiding behind a fair face shall destroy me."

Then followed a moment of relenting.

"She seemed innocent, so pure. She was so gentle and obedient, and owned so meekly that she had been tempted, and had sinned in harkening for a time to the evil tempter. O God, there could be no vileness in the soul that looked up at me from those gentle eyes! And I thrust her from me with violence and contempt, and sent her back to servitude and dependence. My wedded wife, the one creature I have loved most on earth!" He clasped his hands, and looked upward in exaltation of mind.

"Surely that was an atonement for my weakness. Surely that was a sacrifice which Heaven must approve. And yet I have known no peace of mind since that day. Heaven has given me no token of approval or forgiveness."

That intense egotism which is one of the characteristics of a mind off its balance had taken possession of him. He stood face to face with his Creator, and felt himself worthy to be saved.

His daughter knocked at the door presently, and asked him if he would not have a light.

"No," he answered; "my soul can hold communion with God in the darkness. I am alone, as Elijah was upon the mountain, waiting for the voice of the Lord."

It was after midnight when he laid himself upon his bed, wearied with meditations in which his brain had been hyperactive. Tired as he was with the long day and its double service, the long evening and its protracted thoughtfulness, he could not easily sleep; and when, at last, his weary eyelids closed, his slumber was more like a trance than a sleep.

He saw his wife's face looking up to him as she had looked that last day in the lane, pleadingly, piteously, full of grief and love. He saw it more vividly than faces are seen in dreams—saw it close to him as he lay upon his pillow, and was dimly conscious of lying there, and the hour of the night, and that this flow was looking at him from afar off, though it seemed so near that he could have stretched out his hand and touched it.

Then came a voice that thrilled him—

"Joshua, Joshua, come to me!"

He was awake and on his feet in an instant. It seemed to him that waking ears had heard that voice—that it was something more than a part of his dream. He stood listening for some moments, half expecting to hear the cry repeated, and his wife's hand upon his door.

He went to the door and opened it, and looked out upon the landing, faintly lighted by the stars.

No; the place was empty; the lower part of the house was dark and silent. Nothing had happened. It was only a dream.

"But it is a dream sent by Heaven," he said. "I will hearkened to its warning. Yes, my love, I forgive you; I am coming to you. I bring you pardon and love."

He struck a light from the old tinder-box, lighted his candle, and began to dress himself hurriedly. He had looked at his watch on first rising, wondering to find so little of the night was gone. It was twenty minutes past one o'clock.

Joshua took his watch from under his pillow, lifted the glass and laid his finger on the hands and stopped them. Only once before in his life had he ever done the thing, and then it was in a moment of madness, in unconscious, the instant in which the divine assurance of his election and calling had been breathed into his soul. At that blessed moment he had stopped his watch, that it might forever record that one hallowed hour. It was the watch he had used as a young man, and was still in his desk; he had never carried it afterwards, and had endeared his small chronometer to him the more for it. It was his father's fine old time-keeper had descended to him as a part of his inheritance.

It was a curious fancy which moved him to do the same thing twice in his life, and have given no reason for the impulse; but he obeyed it blindly, and the loud ticking of the watch grew still at twenty minutes past one.

TO BE CONTINUED.

MORAL INFLUENCE.

The influence of a good example is far-reaching; for our experience and conflicts with the world lead us at times to indulge misanthropic sentiments, and charge all men with selfish and impure motives. The play of pride, prejudice, and passion, and the cagerness manifested by the great majority of men to advance their own interests, often at the expense of others, and in violation of the golden rule, cause us to look with suspicion on the best intents of others. Arrogance, hypocrisy, treachery, and violence, every day outrage justice, till we are almost disposed to distrust human nature, and become discouraged. But amid all that is sad and disheartening in this lower, unholy world, now and then there is presented to us a life of such uniform virtue, that we recognize it in a character that brings hope for the perfect development, and ultimate regeneration of our race. Such characters are precious, and such examples should be held up to the world for its admiration and imitation; they should be snatched from oblivion and treasured in the hearts and thoughts of all who are in process of forming habits and maturing character.

NEWS NOTES.

OVER two hundred and eighty-six newspapers are published in New York.

THE shop girls of Boston number nearly one-tenth of the entire population of the city.

A COMPANY with a capital of $1,000,000 has been formed in New York for the purpose of introducing four-wheeled one horse cabs at the rate of fifty cents an hour or for a trip not exceeding an hour.

THE medical examiner of a prominent English life insurance company says he has to turn away three-fourths of his applicants who excel in athletic exercises, because they have dangerously strained the organs of the heart.

THE defences of London on the Thames are fast approaching completion. The new works and extensions of old ones which have been effected within the last few years have added materially to the protection of the Thames.

A LEADING Russian journal says that the Russian land army now numbers 1,000,000 up to 2,000,000 men, without counting the national militia. This is undoubtedly strong a proof as to the present status of the Eastern Question.

THE mine of Carpine recently discovered in Fulton County in this State, is said to prove of great value. Mining operations have already been commenced, and it is estimated that over $2,000,000 worth of the mineral is accessible. It is used to mix with other materials, especially to adulterate white lead for painting.

THE large structure erected by the teamsters at Elm Station, on the Pennsylvania Railroad, three miles from the Centennial grounds at Philadelphia, for the accommodation of the order during the Exhibition, has destroyed by fire early on the morn of 17th. It was a frame building 64x30 feet, partly two stories high, with accommodations for five thousand guests. The cost, including furniture, was about $6,000; part of the loss was covered by insurance.

A YOUNG woman has just established a real estate agency in Chicago, and cleared $500 in the first month, says the New Yorker. She has been employed in the office of Miss Ellen Culver, for eight years the Chicago manager of the large real estate business done by the Baltimore millionaire, Mr. Hall. Miss Culver has 300 tenants in charge and collects rents as successfully as if she used the chest tone instead of the "sweet, low voice, that excellent thing in woman."

A DISPATCH from Calcutta says three large islands, namely, Hatiah, Sundeepand Dakhin Shahbazpore, and three smaller islands, included in the Backergunge, Noakhally and Chittagong districts, were entirely submerged by the storm wave of October 31, in which the waters rushed for five or six miles inland. These islands are all situated in or near the estuary of the river Heena. The largest, Dakhin Shahbazpore, was 800 square miles in extent. It had a population of 240,000. Hatiah and Sundeep together had about 180,000 population. The wave swept over the country in the night, in many places to the depth of twenty feet. After the storm wave had passed, it is believed, not a third of the population survived. The islands have barely one-fourth of their former inhabitants.

GRAPES are now shipped to Eastern markets from California, arriving here in good condition and affording a good profit to the shippers. The cars on which they are sent are in the main like ordinary freight cars. They are lined with thick paper, the paper upon the floor being allmoistened—the object being to make the car as nearly air-tight as possible. At the front of the car is a compartment which holds a ton of ice; and a fan, revolving 1,000 times a minute, is attached to the axle, and so arranged that air is forced over the ice and through a metallic cylinder some eight or ten inches in diameter, which extends the entire length of the car. The cylinder is perforated with numerous holes, to allow the cold air to escape and permeate through the car. At the top of the ice compartment there is an open space, and it is proved to be the most perfect way. The grapes are packed in twenty-pound boxes, the car being completely filled. A car holds ten tons of grapes.

A LARGE number of prominent citizens met in the Philadelphia Common Council Chamber Saturday last, to form a stock company to purchase the Main Building as a place for a permanent international exhibition. Hon. Morton McMichael was the president, and George H. Allen acted as secretary. Mr. McMichael stated that the object of the meeting was to perpetuate the grandest exhibition of the arts and sciences the world has ever known. Mr. Clement M. Biddle said the project was now reduced to one of dollars and cents. Mr. Henry M. Pettit predicted the success of the proposed exhibition provided sufficient funds could be secured. He explained that the space had been already received. Mr. Biddle again took the floor and said that enough applications had already been received to assure that the building would be entirely full. Nearly all the foreign departments would be full, and the life and manners of the people of all nations would be represented. In answer to a question from Mr. Grubb, Mr. Biddle explained that the proposed exhibition would not be a bazaar. Colonel Forney made a patriotic appeal for the movement, after which the charter of the proposed association was explained, and it was decided that the name should be known as the International Exhibition Company, with a capital of $500,000, to be divided into 50,000 shares of $100 each. The subscriptions are to be received as follows:

1. Payable in cash as called for by a board of directors to be appointed by the stockholders.

2. Payable by transfer of the stock of the Centennial Board of Finance, the stock of the International Exhibition Company being issued at par for the actual cash that may be realized. Then there was proposed a multitudinous fund, to be made of subscriptions in cash or in stock of the Centennial Board of Finance, each subscriber being entitled to a season ticket for the year 1877, for each $10 contributed, and the other contributors to one season ticket for 1877 for every two shares, or to twenty single tickets for admission for each share.

The amount needed was $750,000 in cash, as may be asked for from time to time, and the remainder in stock.

After the reading of the above, the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That the citizens of Philadelphia, here assembled in town meeting, heartily approve of the organization of a permanent Exhibition at Philadelphia, on the basis of organization to that proposed by the committee, subject to such changes as may seem best to the Board of Directors that a committee of five be appointed to nominate a board of twenty-five directors for the ensuing year.

During the meeting $91,100 was subscribed in cash to the stock of the proposed association, and $46,000 in Centennial stock. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company communicated its desire to subscribe its Centennial stock, amounting to $250,000. The Reading Railroad subscribed its stock too, amounting to $114,000; also, the Lehigh Valley, to the amount of $25,000. The North Pennsylvania and Baltimore roads desired likewise to hand over their stock.

REVIEWS.

FRANK IN THE FORECASTLE, by Harry Castlemon. One of the Frank Nelson series, deservedly a favorite with wide-awake lads. It is written in sprightly style, its incidents not too improbable, but varied enough to hold the attention. Its tone is pure, and it gives pleasant incitement to integrity and gallant action. (Porter & Coates.)

ELBOW ROOM, by Max Adler. The writer, a professed humorist, is somewhat widely known by frequent contributions to the newspaper press. He has worked faithfully to produce a funny book, but while some of the efforts will cause a laugh, there is too little spontaneity, and the style is too labored to give it a place in the first rank of humorous works. (J. M. Stoddart & Co.)

DAVID AND ANNA MATSON, by Abigail Scott Duniway, editor of the Weekly Northwest, in Oregon. A poem modeled on the well known legend of Enoch Arden. The story is well told in smooth verse, not of high order, but sufficiently pure in the plain, quiet style which will be pleasing to a large class of readers. The descriptions are life like, and some of the incidents show much dramatic power. (S. H. Wells & Co.)

THE DRY FORCEMATES, by Noah Brooks, gives the adventures of a party of lads old enough to make a start in life for themselves, who were caught by the gold fever, in its early stages, made their way across land journey to California long before the Pacific Railroad was thought of. The story is full of incidents, and the hardships of the Sierra Nevada are well set forth. It was published as a serial, and will be welcomed in book form by the juvenile community. (Scribner, Armstrong & Co.)

PERSONAL.

CAPTAIN CORNELIUS, Global States minister to Spain, has asked for leave.

MRS. HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD is described in a paragraph as a large-minded little person, with beautiful eyes, a sweet voice, and most refined and womanly manner.

DR. SCHLIEMANN has been officially invited to visit the Emperor of Brazil, and accepts the Emperor of Brazil to Hissarlik in March, having received simple permission from the Grand Vizier.

MR. OSMANYAN, long known in New York, has arrived upon this country, and has assumed the Consul General of Turkey in New York, to be formed by the Turkish government, as one of the representatives of the Americans, who are to have their members in that body.

JOSEPH SMITH, Jr., son of the founder of the Mormon Church, is preaching in Caldwell, Ill. He denies the tenetsof Brigham Young; he says that there are but 300 to 1,000 personal followers, and that the headquarters of the Reformed Church are at Plano, Illinois. He repudiates polygamy, and also "blood atonement."

DOM PEDRO, during his sojourn in Constantinople, offered to sell with whom he came in contact by his habits of economy, giving the impression that the Emperor aspired to a reputation of the ways and means of Western Emperors. He expected to meet Dr. Schliemann at the Dardanelles, and with him proceed to the scene of the Doctor's excavations at Ilion or Troy.

MR. SPURGEON'S sermons he prepares by seven study. His omnivorous and apparently purposeless reading is purposed with two clearly-defined objects—the "sweetening" of the mind by the introduction of new matter and the collection of several and striking illustrations. Thus he has always a good stock in trade to draw from upon any text he may select; but it is nevertheless certain that the Rural discourse indeed out in magnificent tones, yet sometimes the "sweetening" of Lady Jane has it "humbling or mumbling," has all been greatly overdone by half.

MR. GEORGE HENRY LEWES, the husband of "George Eliot," is a man of rather small stature, whose face gives no clear indication of the mental power he unquestionably possesses. His health is infirm, and he looks older than he is. He has always been a hard student, and a resident of London or other large capitals. His manner differs markedly from that of most Englishmen. In his style he abounds in geniality and humbleness. He is fond of epigrams and paradox, and, being a close observer, his narration of men and things is extremely entertaining. He has the reputation of being one of the most brilliant conversationalists in London, though, like most men of letters, he is power in society and monologue. Mr. and Mrs. Lewes live in a suburb of London, and their home is regretted as one of the most pleasant and hospitable of their parents are their ambitions being an additional bond of unity.

LITERARY.

JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY is writing a historical novel.

MISS A. S. EDWARDS is busy on a new book, to be out in Boston and London, including Brussels publication.

The Boston Public Library has now reached 50,000 volumes, besides 6,000 in its seven branches, Sunday.

PROFESSOR WHITNEY is preparing "Lapilamia Waldie, the Lady Disorbed and Disenchanted," for the Atlantic.

PROFESSOR MATHAFEY has written an interesting book on his recent travels in Greece, Asia Minor and the Levant.

W. AND R. CHAMBERS have in preparation, an "Elementary Manual of Animal Physiology," by T. Dick, of Edinburgh.

A REVISED EDITION of Nordhoff's "Cooper's Hawk" is preparing for the press.

A "History of Gold and Silver in Ancient Countries," which will be brought down to the present period.

TALBOTON'S Christmas story is to be published as usual by the Tinsons, of London, will be entitled "Lady Ida," and is a clever young English artist who is rising in fame.

A NEW weekly journal, devoted to social philosophy and science, called "The Popular Thinker" appeared in New York in October, under the auspices of Mr. C. P. Somerby.

THE CHARITY OF LOVE, by Mrs. C. Leland, has a Christmas story in Macmillan's press entitled "Immortals and the Goblins," which is a fairy tale, illustrated with pen drawings by the author.

THE British Literary Museum expended, in 1874, gifts and purchases, 2,000 pounds for manuscripts. In 1875 the purchases of printed books amounted to 40,000, and of manuscripts to 666.

MRS. JANET R. CHASE HUTT, younger daughter of the late Chief Justice Chase, is the author of "Little Gleaners in Fields Far Afar," "Jaret of the Amis," recently published by D. Appleton & Co.

THE "Sketches of Life and Times in the art revival in its application to household furniture and decoration." Two new books in this field are in the Appleton's press, "Art in the Household," by Rev. W. J. Loftie and "A Practical Treatise on House Decoration," by Miss Garrett.

MR. BANCROFT is again at his studies in Washington, making diligent use of the library of Congress, in addition to his own rich collection of books. He will give this evening winter to the completion of his volumes upon the history of the United States from the peace of 1783 to the inauguration of Washington in 1789—a period full of interest, and requiring careful research, discriminating judgment, and special powers of portraiture. Mr Bancroft is now seventy-six years old.

THE famous Sea Psalm Book said in Boston and sold for $1,000 in Sydney, N. S. Rydder, a bookseller of Providence, R. I., was originally the property of the New Jersey Mariner, and given by him to Thomas Prince, who bequeathed it to the Old South Church in 1758. From that body it passed into the possession of the late Nathaniel Bradstreet Shurtleff in 1856, by whose executors it is now sold. The book was the first printed in America, and bears date Cambridge, 1698.

WEAK LUNGS ARE STRENGTHENED, and Pleurisy Pains promptly relieved, by Dr. Jayne's Expectorant.

THE FLOWN BIRD—A JAPANESE SONG.

BY RICHARD HENRY STODDARD.

The maple leaves are whirled away,
The depths of the great pines are stirred
Night settles on the sullen bay,
And on the west the moonlight bird,
As in its nest the mountain bird,
My wandering feet go up and down,
And back and forth, from town to town,
Through the lone streets, and by the sea,
To find the bird that fled from me!
I followed, and I follow yet—
I have forgotten to forget!

My heart goes back, but I go on,
Through summer heat and winter snow
Poor heart! we are no longer one,
We are divided by our woe!
Go to the nest I built, and call—
She may be hiding under all—
The empty nest, if that remains,
And leave me in the long, long rains.
My sorrow with, I have always wed—
I have forgotten to forget!

Men know my story, but not me—
For such fidelity, they say,
Exists not—such a man as he
Exists not in the world to-day!
If his light mind has shown the way,
She is no worse than all the rest,
Constant they are not—only good
To bill and coo, and build under the hood.
He has lost one thing to regret,
He has forgotten to forget!

All day I see the ravens fly,
I hear the sea-birds scream all night—
The moon goes up and down the sky,
And the stars come in glowing light,
Leaves whirl, white flakes about me blow—
Are days spring from the ashes, or do snow
Only my hair? Good by, my heart,
The time has come for us to part,
Be still! you will be happy yet—
For death remembers to forget!

EDINA.

BY MRS. HENRY WOOD,

AUTHOR OF "EAST LYNNE."

(This story was commenced in No. 11, Vol. XL. Back numbers can always be obtained.)

CHAPTER XV.

THE WEDDING.

"Papa, will you come to breakfast?—Oh dear! what is the matter?"

Edina might well ask. She had opened the door of the small consulting-room as the clock was chiming eight—the knell of Frank Raynor's bachelorhood—to tell her father that the meal was waiting, when she saw not only the hearth and the hearth-rug, but the Doctor himself enveloped in a cloud of soot, looking as black as Erebus.

"I said yesterday the chimney wanted sweeping, Edina."

"Yes, papa, and it was going to be done next week. Have you been burning more paper in the chimney?"

"Only just a letter; but the wind took it and carried it up. Well, this is a pretty pickle!"

"The room shall be done to-day, papa. It will be all right and ready for you again by night."

Dr. Raynor took off his coat and shook it, and then went up to his room to get the soot out of his whiskers. The fact was, seeing the letter, to which he had set light with a match, go roaring up the chimney, he stooped hastily to try to get it back again, remembering what a secret blazing had done; when at that moment down came a shower of soot.

As he was descending the stairs again, the front door was opened with a burst and a bang (there are no words at fit to express the mad way in which excited messengers did enter), and told the Doctor that he was wanted, there and then, by somebody who was much ill and appeared to be dying. Drinking a cup of coffee standing, and eating a crust as he went, the Doctor followed the messenger. It had all passed so quickly that Edina had not yet commenced her own breakfast.

"Hester," she said, calling rapidly to the servant maid, "papa has had to go out, and Mr. Frank is not well in. You shall keep the coffee warm, and I will run to Mrs. Trim and see if she can come to-day. We must breakfast later this morning."

Edina hastily put on her bonnet and mantle, and went down the street towards the churchyard. The entrance to the church was at the other end, facing the open country, the parsonage was also; on this side, near to the clerk's house. She thought she could go round to it without crossing the graveyard; and did so. Trying the door, she found it fastened—which was rather unusual at that hour of the morning. It was nothing for the door to be fastened later, when the clerk and his wife were alike abroad; the one on matters connected with his post, the other doing errands in the village, or perhaps at some house, helping to clean. Edina gave a good sharp knock with the handle of her umbrella, which she had brought with her, for dark clouds, threatening rain, were coursing fiercely about the sky. But the knock brought forth no response.

"Now I do hope she is not out at work to-day," exclaimed Edina, referring to Mrs. Trim. "The sweep must come to the room, and Hester cannot well clean up after him herself with all her other work. There's the breakfast should I! If she has to do the cleaning to-day, I must do that."

Another knock brought forth the same result—nothing. Edina turned round to face the churchyard, and stood to think. The goal was towering on the green patch close by.

"If I could find Trim, he would tell me at once whether she's away at work or not. She may be hiding under all this soot. It is curious he should be out; this is their breakfast time."

All in a moment, as she stood there in indecision, an idea struck Edina. Mrs. Trim was no doubt dusting the church. She generally did it on Saturday, and this was Thursday; but, as Edina knew, if the woman was likely to be occupied on the Saturday, she took an earlier day for the duty.

Lightly crossing the stile, Edina went through the churchyard and round the church to the entrance porch. Her quick eyes saw that, though apparently shut, the door was not latched; and she pushed it open.

"Yes, of course; Mary Trim expects to be otherwise busy to-morrow and Saturday, and is doing the dusting to-day," spoke Edina to herself, deeming the appearance conclusive. Well, she will have to make haste here, and come to me as soon as she can."

But it was no Mrs. Trim with her gown turned up about her waist, a round apron on, and a large black bonnet perched far back on her head—for that was her usual church-cleaning costume—that Edina saw as she went gently through the inner green baize door. A very different sight met her eyes: a soft murmur of reading broke upon her ears. The church was not large, as compared with some churches, though of fairly good size for a country parish; and she seemed to come direct upon the solemn scene that was being enacted. At the other end, before the altar stood, side by side, Frank and Margaret St. Clare; facing them was the new clergyman, Mr. Backup, book in hand.

Edina was extremely practical; but at first she could really not believe her eyesight. She stood perfectly motionless, gazing at them like one in a trance. They did not see her; and Mr. Backup's eyes were fixed on his book—which, by the way, seemed to tremble a little in his hands, as though he were being married himself. Coming to a momentary pause, he went on again in a raised voice; and the words fell thrillingly on the ear of Edina.

"I require and charge you both, as ye will answer at the dreadful day of judgment when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed, that if either of you know any impediment, why ye may not be lawfully joined together in matrimony, ye do now confess it. For be ye well assured, that so many as are coupled together otherwise than God's word doth allow are not joined together by God; neither is their matrimony lawful."

The words, word by word, fell not only on Edina's ear; they touched her soul. Oh, was there no impediment? Ought these two silly people, wedding one another in this solemn fashion, and in defiance of parental authority—ought they to stand silent under this solemn exhortation, letting it appear that there was none? Surely this deed ought, at the last moment, to have impedument! Just for the moment it crossed Edina's mind to stand forward, and beg them to reflect, to reflect well, ere this ceremony went on to ghostly length. But she reasoned how unlikely it would be; she knew that she possessed no manner of right to interfere with either the one or the other.

Drawing softly back within the door, she let it close again without noise, and made her way out of the churchyard. It appeared evident that neither the clerk nor his wife was in the church; and, if they had been, Edina would not have attempted to speak to them.

Like one in a dream, went she, up the street again towards home. The clouds had become darker, and seemed to chase each other more swiftly and wildly. But Edina no longer heeded the wind or the weather. They might, in conjunction with burning paper, send the soot down every chimney in the house, for all the matter it was to her just now. She was deeply plunged in a most unpleasant reverie. A reverie which was showing her many future complications for Frank Raynor.

"Good morning, Miss Edina! You be abroad early, ma am."

The voice was Mrs. Trim's; the black bonnet, pushed back on the top of her in a curtsey, was hers also. She carried a small brown jug in her hand, and had met Edina close to the Doctor's house. Edina came out of her absence.

"I have been to see after you, Mrs. Trim, and could not get in. The door was locked."

"Dear now, and I be sorry, Miss Edina! I just went to carry a drop o' coffee and a morsel of hot toast to poor Granny Sandon; who've got nobody much to look after her since Rosaline Bell left. So I just locked the door, and brought the key away with me, as much to keep the nannygoat out as for safety. She've got a way of loosing herself, Miss Edina, clever as I thinks I 'ere her, and if she goes into the house, and they goats butts and bites at things, and does no end o' mischief."

"Your husband is out, then?"

"He've gone off somewhere by rail, Miss Edina. I couldn't get out of him where, though, nor what it were for. They men be closer than was when they want to keep things from ye; and Trim, he be always close. It strikes me, though, he be went somewhere for Mr. Raynor."

"Why do you think that?" cried Edina, quickly.

"Well, I be sure o' one thing, Miss Edina—that Trim had no thought o' going off anywhere when I came home last evening from Penelon; for after we had had a wom o' two about his not seeing to the goats, he said he was going to dig in our garden up to-day; which wouldn't be afore it wants it. Mr. Frank, he came in then, and was talking to Trim in the kitchen, they two together, when I left them. I had asked for a clean clerk shirt, and said he was a-starting out in the morning on business. And sure enough, he have went, Miss Edina, and I found out as he've went by one o' they trains."

Edina said no more. She marshalled the talkative woman indoors to look at the state of the Doctor's room, and told her to make her chances that day. Mrs. Trim took off her shawl there and then, and began to get ready for the work.

The Doctor had returned, and Hester was carrying the breakfast in. Edina took her place at the table, and poured out her father's coffee.

"Is Frank not in yet?" he asked, as she handed it to him.

"Not yet, papa."

"Why, where can he be? He had only Williamson to see."

Edina did not answer. She appeared to be intent on her plate. Fresh and fair and good she looked this morning, in her new gingham dress, purple spots on a cream-colored ground, but she seemed to be lost in thought. The Doctor observed it.

"You are troubling yourself about that mess in my study, child!"

"Oh, no, indeed I am not, papa. Mary Trim is here."

"Are you sure Frank's not in the surgery, Edina?" said Dr. Raynor again presently.

Knowing where Frank was, and the momentous ceremony he was undergoing just then—though by that time it had probably come to an end—Edina might with safety assure the Doctor that he was not in the surgery. Dr. Raynor let the subject drop; Frank had been only gone out on an errand, he supposed, on his way home from Will-annson's; and Edina, perhaps dreading to be further questioned, speedily ended her breakfast, and went to look after Mrs. Trim and the household matters.

When the Reverend Mr. Backup awoke from his slumbers that morning, the simple idea of his being married never had been in his mind that he had a marriage ceremony to perform. Looking at his watch, he found it to be half past seven, and up he started in a flurry. Having lain awake half the night, he had overslept himself.

"Has the clerk been here for the key of the church, Betsey?" he called out to the old servant, just before he went out.

"No, sir."

It wanted only about eight minutes to eight then. Mr. Backup, feeling somewhat surprised, for he had found Clerk Trim particularly attentive to his duties, walked along the passage to the kitchen, and took the church key from the nail where it was kept. Opening the church himself, he then went round to the clerk's house, and found it locked up.

Quite a hot tremor seized him. Without the clerk and his experience, it would be next door to impossible for him to get through the service alone, he might break down. He should not know where to place the couple, or when to tell them to kneel down, when to stand up, or when the ring came in, or anything.

Where was the clerk? Could he have made some mistake as to the time fixed? However, it wanted yet some minutes to eight. Opening the church door, he entered the church, put on his surplice, fetched the prayer-book into the vestry, and began studying the marriage service as therein written.

Frank Raynor came up to the church a minute after the clergyman entered it, and waited in the porch, looking out for his intended bride. Eight o'clock struck; and she had promised to be there before it. Why did she not come? Was her courage failing her? Did the black clouds, which were gathering overhead, appall her? Had Mrs. St. Clare discovered all, and was preventing her? Frank thought it must be one or the other of these calamities.

There he stood, within the shelter of the porch, glancing out at the right and to the left. He could not go to meet her because he did not know which way she would come; she her by the shortest road way, or across the Bare Plain. That was one of the minor matters they had forgotten to settle between themselves.

Frank was gazing this way and that, and getting into as much a flurry as was possible for one of his easy temperament to get, soft, hasty steps were heard approaching, and Margaret, nervous, panting, agitated, fell into his arms.

"My darling! I thought you must be lost."

"I could not get away before, Frank. Of all mornings, Edina must choose this to send Tabitha to my room for some books from the shelves. Now, these did not do; then, the others did not do; the woman did nothing but fetch and carry out. And the servants were about the passages, and oh, I thought I should never get away!"

A moment given to soothe her, to still her beating heart, and they entered the church together. Margaret, with the thick veil she had worn over her pretty morning dress of white-and-peach sprigged muslin, almost as delicate as white. She went up the church, leaning on Frank's arm. Mr. Backup came out of the vestry to meet them. In a few flowing and plausible words, Frank explained that it was himself who required the Doctor's services, had led him the house, and begged him to get the service over as soon as possible.

"The clerk is not here," answered the bewildered man.

"We never mind him," said Frank. "We don't want him."

An older and less timid clergyman might have said, I cannot marry you under these circumstances at Mr. Backup thought of it was the getting through his own part in it. It certainly did strike him as being altogether very strange; the question even crossed his mind whether he was doing right and legally; but the license was in due form, and in his inexperience and his nervousness he did not make inquiries, or raise objections. Why should he not marry this Man, to giveth this Woman to be married to this Man, and there was no response, nobody indeed to respond, he visibly hesitated; but he did not dare to refuse to go on with the service. Such an occasion, he felt, he was alone utterly beyond the Reverend Mr. Backup. He supposed that the clerk was to have acted, but the clerk, from some inexplicable cause, had not come; perhaps he had mistaken the hour. So the service proceeded to its close, and Francis Raynor and Margaret St. Clare were made man and wife.

"And pray with whom have you been walking?" put in Lydia, with astounding emphasis. "Who brought you home?"

"Not any one," choked Daisy, swallowing down her tears, "I walked home by myself. You may ask Mrs. Hunt; she met me. Mamma, may I go up and change my things?"

Mrs. St. Clare said neither yes nor no, but gave tacit permission to stretching out her hand to point to the staircase. Daisy ran the gauntlet of the three faces as she passed on; her mother's was stern, Lydia's supremely scornful, Tabitha's discreetly grim. The two ladies turned into the breakfast parlor, and the maid retired.

"It is easy enough to divine what Daisy has been up to," spoke Lydia, whose speech was not always braced in the easiest of the gold and silver, and thinking how greatly too much it was, and how rich this Mr. Raynor must be.

"Oh, I think we may do me and my wife a good turn, Mr. Backup," said Frank, ingenuously, as he clasped the clergyman's hand, and an irresistible smile of entreaty shone on his attractive face. "Keep the secret. I may tell you, now it is done and over, that nobody knows of this marriage. It is, in fact, a stolen one; and just at present we do not wish it to be disclosed. We have our reasons. In a very short while, it will be sure to be known; but until then, we should be glad for it not to be spoken of. I know we may depend upon your kindness."

Frank, with a winning manner, came to digest the information, to put off his surplice and to lock up the register book. Frank escorted his bride down the aisle. When she stopped to take up her cloak and parasol, he, knowing there were no lookers-on, save the ancient and empty pews, folded her in his arms and kissed her fervently.

"Oh Frank! Frank! don't—we are in church, remember." And there, with an agitation and nervous fear, the bride burst into a fit of hysterical tears.

"Daisy! For goodness sake!—not here. Compose yourself, my love. Oh, pray don't sob like that."

A moment or two, and she was tolerably calm again. No wonder she had given way. She had literally slipped from bond to foot all through the service. A dread of its being interrupted, a nervous terror at what she was doing, held possession of her. To wed, to bind herself to Frank had done wrong, and wished it undone. Just like all the rest of us! We do wrong first, and bewail it afterwards.

"You remain in here, please Frank; let me out alone." she said, a sob catching her breath. "It would not do, you know, for us to go out together, lest we might be seen. Good-bye," she added, timidly holding out her hand.

They were between the green baize door now and the outer one. Frank knew as well as she did that it would be imprudent in Hugh Blow's presence for them to change hand and herself once more to him, and kissed her fifty times.

"Good bless and keep you, my darling! I wish I could see you safely home."

Daisy's suggestion, a night or two ago, of their leaving the church by different doors, had to turn out but a pleasant fiction, since the church possessed but one door. She lightly glided through it when Frank released her, and went towards home by way of the shady road, her veil drawn over her face, her steps fleet. He remained where he was, not showing himself, until she should be at a safe distance.

"If I can but get in without being seen!" thought poor Daisy, her heart beating as she sped along. "Mamma and Lydia will not be up for minutes yet, I know; and all may pass over happily. What a high wind it is!"

The wind was high indeed, carrying Daisy nearly off her feet. It took her cloak and whirled it over her head in the air. As it flurk had it, terrible flutback Daisy thought, who should meet her at that moment but the "remach dressmaker. She had been to the h. out to try dresses on.

"Mrs. St. Clare is quite in a way about you, Miss Margaret," spoke the young woman, who was not pleased at having had her walk partly for nothing. "They have been searching everywhere for you."

"I did not know you were expected this morning," said poor Daisy, after murmuring some explanation of having "come out for a walk."

"Well, Miss Margaret, your mamma told me to come whenever it was most convenient to me; and that's early morning, or late in the evening, so as not to take me out of my work in the day-time. I thought I might just catch you and Miss St. Clare when you were dressing, and could have tried on my bodies without much trouble to you."

"What bodies are they?" asked Margaret. "I did not know that any were being made."

"They are dresses for travelling, miss. Mrs. St. Clare gave me a pattern of the material she would like, and I have been getting them."

"Oh, for travelling," repeated Margaret, whose mind, what with one thing and another, was in a perfect whirl. "Will you like to go back, and try mine on now?"

But the dressmaker declined the proposition. She was nearer Tremach now than she was to the Mount, and her appointment had no work to go on with till she got home to set it for her. Appointing the following morning, she continued her way.

Daisy continued here. It was a most unlucky thing that the dressmaker should have gone to the Mount that morning, of all others! What a fuss there would be! and what excuse could she have for her absence from home? There was but one, as it seemed to Daisy, that she could make—out for a walk.

But the shifting clouds had gathered in one dense black mass overhead, and the rain came pouring down. Daisy had brought no umbrella; nothing but a fashionable parasol about large enough for a doll: one cannot be expected to walk arm-in-arm, as president as was the renowned Mrs. MacStinger. The wind took Daisy's cloak, as before, the drifting rain half blinded her. Before she reached home her pretty muslin dress, and her dainty parasol, and her self also, were wringing wet.

"Now where have you been for a walk?" demanded Mrs. St. Clare, opening upon Daisy in the hall and back of by Tabitha, while Lydia, who had that morning got up betimes, thanks to the exacting dressmaker, looked on from the door of the breakfast-room.

"I went for a walk," gasped Daisy, fully believing all was about to be discovered. "The rain overtook me."

"What a pickle you are in!" commented Lydia.

"Where have you been for a walk?" proceeded Mrs. St. Clare, who was evidently angry.

"Down the road," said Daisy, with a kind of sobbing jerk, the result of emotion and fear. "It—it is pleasant to walk a little before the heat comes on. I—I did not know it was going to rain."

"Pray, how long is it since you found out that it is pleasant to walk a little before the heat comes on?" retorted Mrs. St. Clare, with severe sarcasm. "How many mornings have you been out?"

"Never before this morning, mamma," replied Daisy, with ready earnestness, for it was the truth.

"And pray with whom have you been walking?" put in Lydia, with astounding emphasis. "Who brought you home?"

"Not any one," choked Daisy, swallowing down her tears, "I walked home by myself. You may ask Mrs. Hunt; she met me. Mamma, may I go up and change my things?"

Mrs. St. Clare said neither yes nor no, but gave tacit permission by stretching out her hand to point to the staircase. Daisy ran the gauntlet of the three faces as she passed on; her mother's was stern, Lydia's supremely scornful, Tabitha's discreetly grim. The two ladies turned into the breakfast parlor, and the maid retired.

"It is easy enough to divine what Daisy has been up to," spoke Lydia, whose speech was not always braced in the easiest of tones, as she sat back in an easy-chair, sipping her chocolate, a pink cloak trimmed with swansdown drawn over her head, and the rain and the early rising had made her feel chilly.

"Oh, don't know," said Mrs. St. Clare, in a cross tone. She detested these petty annoyances.

"I do, though," returned Lydia. "Daisy has been out to meet Frank Raynor. Were I you, mamma, I should not allow her so much liberty."

"Give me the sugar, Lydia, and let me have my breakfast in peace."

Daisy, locking her door, burst into a fit of hysterical tears. Her nerves were utterly unstrung. It was impossible to change her garments, and she did so, sobbing wearfully all the while. She wished she had not done what she had done; she wished that Frank could be here to encourage and shield her. When she had completed her toilet, she took the wedding ring from her finger, attached it to a bit of ribbon, and hid it in her bosom.

"Suppose I should never, never be able to wear it openly?" thought Daisy, with a sob and a sigh. "Suppose Frank and I should never see each other again!—never be able to be together? If mamma carries me off abroad, and he stays here, one of us might die before I came back again."

CHAPTER XVI.

UNDER THE EVENING STARS.

"Can you spare me a moment, Frank?"

"Fifty moments if you like, Edina," was the ready answer in the ever-pleasant tone. "Come in."

The Doctor had gone on to its close, and Edina had had no opportunity of speaking to Frank alone. The secret of which she had unexpectedly gained cognizance that morning, was consuming her mind. To be a party to it, and to keep that fact from Frank, was impossible to Edina. Tell him, she must; the sooner the better. After tea, he and the Doctor had sat persistently talking together until dusk, when Frank had to go out to visit a fever-patient in Hugh Blow. Impatient for the chance to tell her husband herself once more to him, and kissed her fifty times.

"Good bless and keep you, my darling! I wish I could see you safely home."

Daisy's suggestion, a night or two ago, of their leaving the church by different doors, had to turn out but a pleasant fiction, since the church possessed but one door. She lightly glided through it when Frank released her, and went towards home by way of the shady road, her veil drawn over her face, her steps fleet. He remained where he was, not showing himself, until she should be at a safe distance.

"If I can but get in without being seen!" thought poor Daisy, her heart beating as she sped along. "Mamma and Lydia will not be up for minutes yet, I know; and all may pass over happily. What a high wind it is!"

The wind was high indeed, carrying Daisy nearly off her feet. It took her cloak and whirled it over her head in the air. As it flurk had it, terrible flutback Daisy thought, who should meet her at that moment but the "remach dressmaker. She had been to the h. out to try dresses on.

"Mrs. St. Clare is quite in a way about you, Miss Margaret," spoke the young woman, who was not pleased at having had her walk partly for nothing. "They have been searching everywhere for you."

"I did not know you were expected this morning," said poor Daisy, after murmuring some explanation of having "come out for a walk."

"Well, Miss Margaret, your mamma told me to come whenever it was most convenient to me; and that's early morning, or late in the evening, so as not to take me out of my work in the day-time. I thought I might just catch you and Miss St. Clare when you were dressing, and could have tried on my bodies without much trouble to you."

"What bodies are they?" asked Margaret. "I did not know that any were being made."

"They are dresses for travelling, miss. Mrs. St. Clare gave me a pattern of the material she would like, and I have been getting them."

"Oh, for travelling," repeated Margaret, whose mind, what with one thing and another, was in a perfect whirl. "Will you like to go back, and try mine on now?"

But the dressmaker declined the proposition. She was nearer Tremach now than she was to the Mount, and her appointment had no work to go on with till she got home to set it for her. Appointing the following morning, she continued her way.

Daisy continued here. It was a most unlucky thing that the dressmaker should have gone to the Mount that morning, of all others! What a fuss there would be! and what excuse could she have for her absence from home? There was but one, as it seemed to Daisy, that she could make—out for a walk.

But the shifting clouds had gathered in one dense black mass overhead, and the rain came pouring down. Daisy had brought no umbrella; nothing but a fashionable parasol about large enough for a doll: one cannot be expected to walk arm-in-arm, as president as was the renowned Mrs. MacStinger. The wind took Daisy's cloak, as before, the drifting rain half blinded her. Before she reached home her pretty muslin dress, and her dainty parasol, and her self also, were wringing wet.

"Now where have you been for a walk?" demanded Mrs. St. Clare, opening upon Daisy in the hall and back of by Tabitha, while Lydia, who had that morning got up betimes, thanks to the exacting dressmaker, looked on from the door of the breakfast-room.

"I went for a walk," gasped Daisy, fully believing all was about to be discovered. "The rain overtook me."

"What a pickle you are in!" commented Lydia.

"Where have you been for a walk?" proceeded Mrs. St. Clare, who was evidently angry.

"Down the road," said Daisy, with a kind of sobbing jerk, the result of emotion and fear. "It—it is pleasant to walk a little before the heat comes on." I—I did not know it was going to rain."

"Pray, how long is it since you found out that it is pleasant to walk a little before the heat comes on?" retorted Mrs. St. Clare, with severe sarcasm. "How many mornings have you been out?"

"Never before this morning, mamma," replied Daisy, with ready earnestness, for it was the truth.

"And pray with whom have you been walking?" put in Lydia, with astounding emphasis. "Who brought you home?"

"Not any one," choked Daisy, swallowing down her tears, "I walked home by myself. You may ask Mrs. Hunt; she met me. Mamma, may I go up and change my things?"

Mrs. St. Clare said neither yes nor no, but gave tacit permission by stretching out her hand to point to the staircase. Daisy ran the gauntlet of the three faces as she passed on; her mother's was stern, Lydia's supremely scornful, Tabitha's discreetly grim. The two ladies turned into the breakfast parlor, and the maid retired.

"It is easy enough to divine what Daisy has been up to," spoke Lydia, whose speech was not always braced in the easiest of tones, as she sat back in an easy-chair, sipping her chocolate, a pink cloak trimmed with swansdown drawn over her head, and the rain and the early rising had made her feel chilly.

"Oh, don't know," said Mrs. St. Clare, in a cross tone. She detested these petty annoyances.

"I do, though," returned Lydia. "Daisy has been out to meet Frank Raynor. Were I you, mamma, I should not allow her so much liberty."

"Give me the sugar, Lydia, and let me have my breakfast in peace."

Daisy, locking her door, burst into a fit of hysterical tears. Her nerves were utterly unstrung. It was impossible to change her garments, and she did so, sobbing wearfully all the while. She wished she had not done what she had done; she wished that Frank could be here to encourage and shield her. When she had completed her toilet, she took the wedding ring from her finger, attached it to a bit of ribbon, and hid it in her bosom.

"Suppose I should never, never be able to wear it openly?" thought Daisy, with a sob and a sigh. "Suppose Frank and I should never see each other again!—never be able to be together? If mamma carries me off abroad, and he stays here, one of us might die before I came back again."

CHAPTER XVI.

UNDER THE EVENING STARS.

"Can you spare me a moment, Frank?"

"Fifty moments if you like, Edina," was the ready answer in the ever-pleasant tone. "Come in."

The Doctor had gone on to its close, and Edina had had no opportunity of speaking to Frank alone. The secret of which she had unexpectedly gained cognizance that morning, was consuming her mind. To be a party to it, and to keep that fact from Frank, was impossible to Edina. Tell him, she must; the sooner the better. After tea, he and the Doctor had sat persistently talking together until dusk, when Frank had to go out to visit a fever-patient in Hugh Blow. Impatient for the chance to tell her husband herself once more to him, and kissed her fifty times.

"Good bless and keep you, my darling! I wish I could see you safely home."

Daisy's suggestion, a night or two ago, of their leaving the church by different doors, had to turn out but a pleasant fiction, since the church possessed but one door. She lightly glided through it when Frank released her, and went towards home by way of the shady road, her veil drawn over her face, her steps fleet. He remained where he was, not showing himself, until she should be at a safe distance.

"If I can but get in without being seen!" thought poor Daisy, her heart beating as she sped along. "Mamma and Lydia will not be up for minutes yet, I know; and all may pass over happily. What a high wind it is!"

The wind was high indeed, carrying Daisy nearly off her feet. It took her cloak and whirled it over her head in the air. As it flurk had it, terrible flutback Daisy thought, who should meet her at that moment but the "remach dressmaker. She had been to the h. out to try dresses on.

"Mrs. St. Clare is quite in a way about you, Miss Margaret," spoke the young woman, who was not pleased at having had her walk partly for nothing. "They have been searching everywhere for you."

"I did not know you were expected this morning," said poor Daisy, after murmuring some explanation of having "come out for a walk."

"Well, I hardly know. Don't said me, Edina."

"I have no right to send you," she answered. "And scolding would be of no use now the thing is done. Nevertheless, I must tell you what a very wrong step it was to take; lamentably imprudent; and I think you must, yourself, know that ... was. I could never have believed it of Margaret St. Clare."

"Do not blame Daisy, Edina. I persuaded her to take it. Mrs. St. Clare has been talking of marching her off abroad, and we wanted, you see, to secure ourselves against separation."

"And what are you going to do, Frank?"

"Oh, nothing," said easy Frank. "Daisy's gone back to the Mount, and I am here as usual. As soon as I can make a home for her, I shall fetch her away."

"Make a home where?"

"In some place where there's a likelihood of a good practice. London, I dareay."

"But how are you to live? A good practice does not spring up in a night, like a mushroom."

"That's arranged," replied Frank, as perfectly confident himself that it was arranged as that Edina was sitting on the low chair, and he settling his shoulders into his coat. "My uncle Jem, said Edina, and Uttle High know what time ... and it was in pursuance of them that I went over to Eagles' Nest. I will tell you about it to-morrow; there's no time now."

"Does Daisy know of what took place this morning?"

"Not that. Nobody knows of that. We don't want it known, if we can help it, until the time comes when all the world may know."

"Meaning until you have gained the home, Frank?"

"Meaning until I and Daisy enter upon it," said sanguine Frank.

Edina's hand—her elbow resting on her knee—was raised to support her head; her fingers played absently with her soft brown hair; her thick, thoughtful eyes, gazing before her, seemed to see nothing. Whether it might arise from the fact that in her early days of privation, when Dr. Raynor's means were so narrow, she had become practically acquainted with some dark phases of existence, or whether it was the blight that had been cast on her heart in its first bloom, she could not tell; but Frank Raynor was no longer of a sanguine nature. Where Frank saw only sunshine in prospective, she saw shadow. And a great deal of it.

"You should have made sure of the home first."

"Before making sure of Daisy? Not a bit of it, Edina. We shall get along."

"Are you sure of Frank?" she exclaimed, petulantly, in her vexation. "You would as soon marry ten wives as one, the law allowing it, so far as never giving a sign have to tell you what to do with them."

"But the law would not allow it," laughed Frank.

"It is your great fault—never to think of consequences."

"True enough for that, Edina, when the consequences come."

She did not make any rejoinder. To what use? Frank Raynor would be Frank Raynor to the end of time. It was his nature.

"It is odd, though, is it not, that you, of all Tremach, should just happen to have caught us?" he exclaimed, alluding to the ceremony of the morning. "But you'll not betray us, will you, Edina?——I must be off down, or Uncle Hugh will be calling to know what I'm doing."

Edina rose with a sigh. "No, I will not betray you, Frank; you know there is no danger of that; and if I can help you and Daisy in any way, I will do it. I was obliged to tell you what I had seen, and could not keep from you the fact that it had come to my knowledge."

As Frank leaped down stairs, light-hearted as a lad, Edina was stooping from the sitting-room to the surgery. He hailed to speak.

"I forgot to tell you, Frank, that you may as well call this evening on Dame Bell; you will be passing her door."

"Is Dame Bell ill again?" asked Frank.

"I fear so. A woman came for some medicine for her to-day."

"I thought she was at Falmouth."

"She is back again, it seems. Call and see how as you go along; you have plenty of time."

"Very well, Uncle Hugh."

The Bare Plain might be said to deserve its name very especially this evening as Frank traversed it. In the morning the wind had blown high, but nothing to what it was now. It played amid the openings surrounding the Bottomless Shaft, going in with a whirr, coming out with a rush, and shrieked and moaned fearfully. The popular belief indulged in by the miners was, that this unearthly shrieking and moaning, which generally disturbed the air on these lonely nights, proceeded not from the wind, but from Dan Sandon's ghost. Frank Raynor had no faith in the ghost—Dan Sandon's, or any other—but he shuddered as he hastened by.

The illness (more incipient than declared) from which Mrs. Bell had been suffering, seemed to cease with her trouble. Her husband's mysterious disappearance was followed by much improvement in her mind and body, on her own part; and her ailments nearly left her. Dr. Raynor suspected—perhaps knew—that the improvement was due to the fact that he did not tell her so. Dame Bell moved briskly about her house, providing for the comforts of her lodgers, and waiting for the husband who did not come.

Reason did not come, either. And her prolonged absence seemed to her mother most unaccountable, her excuses for it unreasonable. As the days and the weeks had gone on, she had continued to hope to be no nearer that ever. Dame Bell grew angry. She at length made up her mind to go to Falmouth, and bring back the runaway with her, by hook or by crook.

Easier said than done, that; as Mrs. Bell found. When she, after two days' absence, returned to her home on the Bare Plain, she returned alone; her daughter was not with her. This was only a few days ago. The Dame had been ailing ever since, some of the old symptoms having come back again—the result perhaps of the travelling—and she had thought she sent a neighbor to Dr. Raynor's for some medicine.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

MARKS OF A GENTLEMAN.—No man is a gentleman who, without provocation, would treat with incivility the humblest of his fellow-creatures. It is vulgarity for which no accomplishment of dress or address can ever atone. Show us the man who desires to make every one around him happy, and who can dispense with solicitude to never to give cause of offence to any one, and we will show you a gentleman by nature and species, though he may never have worn a suit of broadcloth, nor ever heard of a lexicon. We are proud to say, for the honor of our species, there are many men in every think of whose heart there is solicitude for the welfare of mankind, and whose every breath is perfumed with kindness.

THE MOUND BUILDERS.

Last week a party of scientific explorers made some very interesting discoveries in the vicinity of Milton, Wisconsin. There are in that vicinity a number of mounds belonging to the class which represent archæological investigation has referred to that mysterious race which inhabited the central portion of North America long before the present aborigines obtained a foothold there. Selecting the largest of these mounds, the explorers dug a trench from its outer edge to the centre, thirty feet long, five feet wide, and at the centre attaining a depth of ten feet. About a foot from the bottom, at the deepest part of the excavation, a layer of ashes and decayed wood was laid bare. A few inches below this was a hard deposit resembling mortar, and beneath were found the remains of four adults and two children. That they belonged to the race of Mound-builders is inferred from the fact that there had previously been exhumed, only eighteen inches below the surface, a complete Indian skeleton. The other, and vastly more important relics, were eight and a half feet lower down. The first of these, the skeleton of a man, lay with the head to the west in a reclining position. At the knees, near each hand, were two articles, consisting of the teeth of some wild animal, about four inches long, and having holes bored through for the string which attached them to the wrists. Close by was the skull, but so badly decayed as to prevent removal. A little to the south of the skull were four perfect flint arrow heads, as cleanly cut as if the work had been done with the best modern machinery. Lying around and under the shoulders were twenty-nine beads, manufactured from small shells, and perforated so as to be worn as a necklace. Evidently this was the skeleton of some famous personage, for among the bones of the five others no ornaments whatever were found. The chief's companions were arranged about him to the west, northward and east. In the jaw-bone of one was a partly-developed wisdom-tooth, and most of the jaw-bones and teeth were in good preservation.

FARM AND GARDEN.

FEVER IN THE FEET.—There is nothing better for fever in the feet of horses than bandages and a good "stuffing." Bandages and "stuffing" with fifts so other recommended.

HOW TO KEEP APPLES.—Apples that were stored in bins just as they were picked from the trees showed little inclination to decay, stored in a cool place where the frost will not reach them. It will be most profitable in some places, if one has the convenience, to make the apples into vinegar. Cider made from the best apples is the best cider, best for family use, as fermentation goes on more gradually.

COWS.—As soon as cows are put on dry feed, the milk falls off, but if they are well fed, what is lost in quantity is gained in quality. A cow that is fed on cornstalks, with most two quarts of mixed corn-meal and bran daily, with as much cut-shaffed hay as she will eat, A cow will usually eat two bushels of the cut. It is a day, some rate in addition would be useful. Dry cows should have one quart daily; it will not hurt a cow to take on a little fat at this season, nor make her milk any less when she comes in.

THE WATERING OF HORSES.—M. P. Cartridge, member of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons, urges the great importance of allowing an unlimited supply of water to horses, and he alludes to the very mistaken notion among grooms and others having the charge of horses, that water is deleterious to vigorous. While grooms and others drink without stint themselves, they profess to know when a horse has drank sufficient, and mistake away the pail before his natural wants are satisfied. Horses should be allowed to assume if wanted frequently, and in their case drinking does no harm.

FRUIT CELLARS.—Fruit cellars need carefully ventilated, for the late sorts to come to proper perfection, and to keep well, they must be in a temperature as cool as possible without freezing. It must not be forgotten that fruit in ripening gives off heat, and this must be regulated by the admission of cool air from the outside. In ripening, a considerable amount of carbonic acid is given off, which should be of use in retarding the ripening, but very dangerous if allowed to accumulate in the cellar of a growing, tender vegetation by means of a chimney, or in some other manner, in a matter that must be attended to.

SHEEP.—No stock requires more careful attention than sheep. If not well fed they suffer, and if they are well fed they become dainty and fine appetite. Period regularly should be observed in feeding, and then they will not neglect some food while waiting for their grain. A system should be adopted and adhered to, if it be only that of feeding daily, is sufficient at present. It is easier to increase the feed than to diminish it. Ample room, and open yards should be provided for sheep. Crowding and heating will cause sickness of the flock. Sheep will not do well if huddled together. Unless yards are wanted for the fattener, they should not be coupled until late in the month. Sheep of different ages, the couple should come with the young grass.

HOW TO MAKE GOOD CIDER.—The best cider is made as late in the fall as possible and from clean, sound apples. To keep it through the winter and for a year or more, infuse our peculiar to the cider, and the weak ago—that is, barrel it immediately and remove it to a cool vault or cellar where it can lie remain until February or March, when it should be put in strong bottles and firmly wired down, to be placed on the ground or shelves where the temperature is cool and uniform, and there it will ripen very rapidly or will not freeze. If the cider before barrelling be filtered through sand, it will probably keep better and be free of any sediment, but any mustard, sulphate, raisins, beating, or any other mixture, will do more damage it and will be no aid to its preservation.

GRAPE VINES.—Beginners make a great mistake in making old vines. We are offered vines, and we receive an inch or more in diameter without as much as a good year old root which have a root one, two, or three years old, with abundant fibrous roots are procurable for one or two. Cut back the stem to a bud, plant in good, over-rich soil, spreading the roots well, and then cover the surface with a mulch of rotted manure. Directions for pruning fruiting vines, as all depends upon previous treatment and present conditions. It must be borne in mind that the GRUMPIBUS AND THE CEREUS.

BY V. R.

Lubin Twinkle was lying half asleep among the ferns, now closing his eyes, now looking straight up into the sky where the fleecy clouds sailed quietly through the deep, then watching the fallow deer butting each other, when turning on his side he saw just before his face the fairy queen's palace. The tall fern that covered him opened into a long avenue, where the stems all seemed to form the columns of a miniature cathedral. The leaves were jointed at the ends with beautiful little groups of wild flowers, and each division exactly like the other. Lubin never could tell how long it was; but of this he was certain; that you grew less and less in the distance, and through the last arch he saw the village church, and the murmur of its bells sounded on his ear. Often he had tried to find the place, and crossed and recrossed the fern in every direction, careful not to break in the leafy roof or cast down the frail pillars; but he never again saw the fairy hall nor heard the church bells ringing as they were ringing then.

He learned something about the fairies, however, which I never saw written anywhere. All the fairies we read of are either very young and beautiful, doing all sorts of odd good things, or very old and ugly, with wands like a crutch, never so well pleased as when they are doing mischief. Now it is true that the great apes are very kind and good when they are young, and grow fierce and dangerous as they get old; but why this should be, or why the old fairies should get ill-natured, I do not understand. However, Lubin saw not merely little baby fairies, who could not fly, trying to climb up the stems of the fern, while their mothers fluttered over them and held them by their wings for leading strings for fear they should fall, but fairies of all ages—little gentlemen fairies in pea-green coats and yellow waistcoats, sitting in easy chairs reading newspapers; one was leaning against a fern stem smoking a pipe, while an active little manikin was giving directions for keeping the roof in repair to workmen and workwomen fairies, who weather-proofed it by constantly twining in fresh leaves.

The queen herself sat in the very middle of the hall upon a round throne covered with scarlet velvet and heaped with natural flowers, when Lubin saw a fairy in a white wig and black gown come bowing and scraping at a great rate to the foot of the throne. The queen lightly bounded into the air, and danced down gracefully on her feet, when a whole guard of fairies removed the flowers and the velvet from her throne, and exposed to Lubin's astonished eyes a blue china teacup without a handle, turned upside down. If you may laugh, but the fairies, china was so much stronger than anything the fairies could make for themselves, that happening to find the broken teacup in the hall, that very little man with a wig, who came bowing to the queen, resolved to make a state prison of it, that all fairies who offended against the laws might be put under it; and the queen was so much pleased to think she had got all her trouble from some subjects shut up so safely, that she made the bottom of the teacup her throne, and sat upon it.

You would expect that the queen, when she wanted to be by any one out, would give the teacup a tap with her wand, and out they would come. Ah dear! the poor fairies would have been spared some very hard work if she had done so. Lubin saw fifty at least of them passing their wands in under the edge of the cup, and at last they lifted it high enough for one fairy to creep out of it. A miserable creature he looked. If fairies had chimneys, you would have said he was the chimney sweep.

But how came he in such a mess, and how came he under the teacup? I'll tell you. The fairies think it very wicked for any one to enjoy alone a pleasure he might share with the others. Dress any one skimming along the meadows light on the first bloom upon the rose, home he goes to the fairy hall and invites his companions to enjoy it, and out they troop by hundreds to the softest grass or the sweetest flowers than away one of them can find. Nay, so carefully do they observe this law, that never does a fairy find anywhere a very comfortable nook or corner but before he sits down he goes to tell a little sister or brother where to find him.

Now the prisoner was a fairy called Grumpibus, and the night before he had got into trouble. He had been flying about among the flowers in the hot-house, many of which were beautiful, but none so very new or fragrant that he felt he ought to call the other fairies to the treat, when as the evening came on and the windows were going to be shut he set off to return home. But the air already felt cold outside the hot-house, and as he lighted upon the top of the flue he found a warm soft air coming from it, for the stoker had burned the clear coke and made no smoke. "How comfortable!" said Grumpibus, as he crept into the chimney pot. "I won't go home till morning. This shall be my country seat. I wonder if it won't be warm for fear they should all come and I should not have room." So he stretched out his legs as wide as he could, and put his hands into his pockets, to see how much room he could take up. Once or twice he thought he ought to go and report the sing corner he had found out. Lucky for him it would have been if he had, for other fairies knew more about that corner than Grumpibus.

So after taking up all the room he could, Grumpibus fell fast asleep in the corner of the chimney pot, and knew not how long he had been there, when the gardener came round to look at the stoves, and taking a shovel of small coal he threw it upon each of the fire-places. Up mounted into the air a thick black smoke, and pouring into the chimney pot nearly suffocated Grumpibus. It made him so black that when he flew away in a fright to the fairy hall his own mother did not know him, but thought it must be one of the black pioneers out of the coal mine who had been sent up on some business. Being a suspicious person, however, a fairy in a blue coat with a shiny top to his hat, who was the policeman to the palace, soon caught hold of him, and without hearing a word he had to say for himself put him under the teacup. Tittipro, for that was the little officer's name in the white hat, was all in a fuss before the queen, and when Grumpibus came out so black and dingy, she turned to him to hear the story. He had not a word to say for himself, so the queen graciously said, "Since you have passed the night under the teacup, I shall inflict no further punishment upon you." Then turning to Tittipro, she said, "Let four washerwomen take their mops and go down to the rivulets, and see if they can't get him clean and fit to come into our hall again." At the word the four laundresses who had the charge of the queen's own linen were on the spot. Two took mops, two took scrubbing brushes, and they mopped and scrubbed at Grumpibus till he roared aloud—at last they got him clean.

Very hard, thought Grumpibus, that when a fairy has found anything comfortable he must not keep it to himself. "I will though, that I will," said he, and from that time he used to go about very much alone—poking bits of sticks into the bee-hives at night, and flying away before the bees were disturbed, thus spoiling a rough of honey that he might suck the end of the stick. Then perhaps he would get into a dairy, and waiting there till the skim of a bowl that was to stand for cream, he would stir it up with his wand; and that he called making a storm. Then if some poor industrious spider had spent all the day making a new web, Grumpibus would jump into the middle of it, draw it out into long cord and swing on it for half an hour, then fly away, little thinking of the misery which a man had caused the spider. The least pleasure for himself he always thought more of than the greatest trouble to any one else. At last he found a great pleasure, and he enjoyed it all alone.

Few fairies of that country had ever seen the night-blooming cereus in flower. The wonderful things they had read of in its account were and its beauty everbody knew in fairyland, and many a wee heart sighed—"Oh, if I might see the night-blooming cereus!" Now just beside the hot-house in a little chamber kept locked up, there were one of these rare plants, and Grumpibus heard from something said by the gardener, that it would certainly flower that year. Well, thought Grumpibus, if I find where this cereus flowers, and tell the fairies, they will certainly make friends with me again. And he was always fluttering about this spot till he found a small window open through which he could creep, and at night he got in and slept under the cereus leaves, impatiently waiting till he should see the bud burst.

(CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.)

THE CODFISH.

A St. John (N. F.) correspondent of the Montreal Gazette gives the following account of the processes used in preparing the codfish for market: "The codfish, after being caught, split and washed, are spread to dry on the "flake," which is formed of green boughs, supported by a framework resting on upright poles. Here the cod are spread out to bleach by exposure to sun and air, and during this process require constant attention. At night, or on the approach of rain, they are made up into little round heaps, with the skin outward, in which state they look very much like small hayracks. When the "bloom," or whitish appearance, which for the moment they assume, comes out on the dried fish, the process is finished, and they are then ready for shipping. On being conveyed to the premises of the exporting merchant, they are first "culled," or assorted, into different kinds, known as "merchantable," "Madeira," "West India," and "Dun," or inferior fish. The first is the best quality; the second a grade lower; the third is a grade lower still; and the fourth, which is unpalable of keeping, is used at home. The cod sent to hot countries is packed by screw power into small casks called "drams," that which goes to the Mediterranean is usually exported in bulk. We ship large quantities of dried cod to Brazil, and there is hardly an inhabited corner of that vast empire where the Newfoundland cod is not to be found, being carried on the backs of mules from the seacoast into the most distant provinces of the interior. The negroes of the West Indies welcome it as a grateful addition to their vegetable diet. To all parts of the Mediterranean it finds its way—Italians, Greeks and Neffiaes equally relishing the produce of our sea harvest. The Spaniards and Portuguese are our best customers, and all over the sunny peninsula the "bacalo" have been a standing dish since the days of Cervantes, who makes special mention of our cod in "Don Quixote" under that name. In Great Britain and the United States we have thousands of customers. In the warmer regions of the earth, however, the people seem to have a special liking for the dried and salted cod, and to them it is an almost indispensable article of food. The ports of Brazil, Spain and Italy are opened up by railways and other means of transit, the greater becomes the demand for cod, as the cost is lessened. The advancing price of fresh meat of all kinds in various countries is rapidly increasing the demand for cod, and has considerably enhanced its value. Twelve or fourteen years ago the average price of fish was from twelve to fifteen shillings per quintal. It is now exactly double that price.

A BRIGHT HORSE AND A STUPID ONE.

The Boston Journal relates the following:—"Among the many horses owned by the Highland Street Railroad Company is one who used to amuse the people by his trouble by slipping his halter and roaming at will about the stable. The halter was on each occasion buckled on as tightly as possible, but to no purpose. In the morning would invariably be found half an hour afterward making a dignified tour of the stable. This became monotonous to the hostler, and he determined to ascertain the modus operandi of the thing, so he carefully secured his liberty. Again the halter was tightly buckled on, and taking a seat where he could watch his troublesome charge, he awaited developments. Pretty soon the horse who stood beside the troublesome one was observed to poke his nose into his neighbor's stall, and catching the end of the halter strap between his teeth, he pulled at it. His first, second, and third attempts to unloose the buckle were unavailing, but with remarkable perseverance the horse returned to his work repeatedly, and finally got dropped the buckle, when the throat strap fell, and the horse of inquisitive mind was soon stalking about the stable again. A change of location was of course a necessity. A large, homely, pseudo-gelding owned by this company used to manifest a strange regard for a white mare he formerly worked beside. In the stable he was hitched with a rope halter, and, until a chain was substituted, he used to gnaw off his halter, macerate off deliberately to the stall occupied by his mate, and squeeze himself into the same stall, which was only large enough to accommodate one horse comfortably, and a good deal of effort was required to separate the equines after they had become wedged in so closely."

HAPPINESS is inborn. It is not an outward trait. It is generated in the soul. It is never bought or sold as an article of commerce. You may fill your house with all manner of beautiful and curious things, but you cannot lay in a stock of happiness in the same way. If you are happy, your happiness is that which you are able to make by the use of the mind itself. A fundamental condition of happiness in this world is activity, and that kind of activity which carries with it all the faculties.

HERE AND THERE.

WASTE of "T"—Putting it in "dispat."

THE young man that boasted that he would make a noise in the world, now feels a going for a hotel.

AN inveterate old bachelor says ships are called "she" because they always keep a man on the look-out.

"That's the only wedding trip I shall probably ever take," said a bachelor, as he stumbled over a bridal chair.

"If there's no moonlight, will you meet me by gaslight, dearest Juliana?" asked he. "No, Angelina, I won't. I am to gas meter," replied she.

THE following notice is pasted conspicuously in a Boston car: "Gentlemen, when you have done talking on business, serve your mouth the same way."

OF 10 persons observed on the street cars yesterday by an obtuse traveler they were all their brains—when they ought to have their brains backs.

"That a blessing it is," says a hard-working Chicago freshman, "that night never comes when a man is tired out, when a man is tired out can't work any more.

A VETERAN student of human nature says that the man who "knows how" is the man who wants a cook, lady, a blacksmith. If one wants a wife, take mother.

DEAD asleep in the bed and the performance of a certain dramatic club, an author replied that he should "hardly call it a club, but rather a mutual benefit society."

A NEW YORK paper states that a laborer in an ice-house down East, was killed by a large piece of ice falling on his head. Verdict of the jury, "Died of hard drink."

HORTICULTURE generally with poems as the subject, we think that it must have one of these rare plants, and Grumpibus heard from something said by the gardener, that it would certainly flower that year. Well, thought Grumpibus, if I find where this cereus flowers, and tell the fairies, they will certainly make friends with me again. And he was always fluttering about this spot till he found a small window open through which he could creep, and at night he got in and slept under the cereus leaves, impatiently waiting till he should see the bud burst.

(CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.)

THE CODFISH.

A St. John (N. F.) correspondent of the Montreal Gazette gives the following account of the processes used in preparing the codfish for market: "The codfish, after being caught, split and washed, are spread to dry on the "flake," which is formed of green boughs, supported by a framework resting on upright poles. Here the cod are spread out to bleach by exposure to sun and air, and during this process require constant attention. At night, or on the approach of rain, they are made up into little round heaps, with the skin outward, in which state they look very much like small hayracks. When the "bloom," or whitish appearance, which for the moment they assume, comes out on the dried fish, the process is finished, and they are then ready for shipping. On being conveyed to the premises of the exporting merchant, they are first "culled," or assorted, into different kinds, known as "merchantable," "Madeira," "West India," and "Dun," or inferior fish. The first is the best quality; the second a grade lower; the third is a grade lower still; and the fourth, which is unpalable of keeping, is used at home. The cod sent to hot countries is packed by screw power into small casks called "drams," that which goes to the Mediterranean is usually exported in bulk. We ship large quantities of dried cod to Brazil, and there is hardly an inhabited corner of that vast empire where the Newfoundland cod is not to be found, being carried on the backs of mules from the seacoast into the most distant provinces of the interior. The negroes of the West Indies welcome it as a grateful addition to their vegetable diet. To all parts of the Mediterranean it finds its way—Italians, Greeks and Neffiaes equally relishing the produce of our sea harvest. The Spaniards and Portuguese are our best customers, and all over the sunny peninsula the "bacalo" have been a standing dish since the days of Cervantes, who makes special mention of our cod in "Don Quixote" under that name. In Great Britain and the United States we have thousands of customers. In the warmer regions of the earth, however, the people seem to have a special liking for the dried and salted cod, and to them it is an almost indispensable article of food. The ports of Brazil, Spain and Italy are opened up by railways and other means of transit, the greater becomes the demand for cod, as the cost is lessened. The advancing price of fresh meat of all kinds in various countries is rapidly increasing the demand for cod, and has considerably enhanced its value. Twelve or fourteen years ago the average price of fish was from twelve to fifteen shillings per quintal. It is now exactly double that price.

A BRIGHT HORSE AND A STUPID ONE.

The Boston Journal relates the following:—"Among the many horses owned by the Highland Street Railroad Company is one who used to amuse the people by his trouble by slipping his halter and roaming at will about the stable. The halter was on each occasion buckled on as tightly as possible, but to no purpose. In the morning would invariably be found half an hour afterward making a dignified tour of the stable. This became monotonous to the hostler, and he determined to ascertain the modus operandi of the thing, so he carefully secured his liberty. Again the halter was tightly buckled on, and taking a seat where he could watch his troublesome charge, he awaited developments. Pretty soon the horse who stood beside the troublesome one was observed to poke his nose into his neighbor's stall, and catching the end of the halter strap between his teeth, he pulled at it. His first, second, and third attempts to unloose the buckle were unavailing, but with remarkable perseverance the horse returned to his work repeatedly, and finally got dropped the buckle, when the throat strap fell, and the horse of inquisitive mind was soon stalking about the stable again. A change of location was of course a necessity. A large, homely, pseudo-gelding owned by this company used to manifest a strange regard for a white mare he formerly worked beside. In the stable he was hitched with a rope halter, and, until a chain was substituted, he used to gnaw off his halter, macerate off deliberately to the stall occupied by his mate, and squeeze himself into the same stall, which was only large enough to accommodate one horse comfortably, and a good deal of effort was required to separate the equines after they had become wedged in so closely."

SCHENCK'S MANDRAKE PILLS.

Act upon the Liver, removing all obstructions, relax the ducts of the gall-bladder, the bile starts freely and the liver is soon relieved, the stools will show what the Pills can do. Nothing has ever been invented which can rival this as a family medicine which is very dangerous to use in doses with great effect, and will unloose the gall-bladder and start the secretions of the Liver. The SCHENCK'S MANDRAKE PILLS.

DR. RADWAY'S Sarsaparillian Resolvent.

THE GREAT BLOOD PURIFIER

FOR THE CURE OF ALL CHRONIC DISEASES, SCROFULA, ULCERS, CHRONIC RHEUMATISM, ERYSIPELAS, KIDNEY, BLADDER, AND LIVER COMPLAINTS, DYSPEPSIA, AFFECTIONS OF THE LUNGS AND THROAT, IMPURITIES THE BLOOD, RESTORING HEALTH AND VIGOR, CLEARSKIN AND BEAUTIFUL COMPLEXION SECURED TO ALL.

Sold by Druggists. Price $1 per bottle.

R. R. R. RADWAY'S READY RELIEF.

THE CHEAPEST AND BEST MEDICINE FOR FAMILY USE IN THE WORLD!

ONE 50 CENT BOTTLE

WILL CURE MORE COMPLAINTS AND PREVENT THE SYSTEM FROM THE SEVERAL ATTACKS OF EPIDEMICS AND CONTAGIOUS DISEASES, THAN ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS EXPENDED FOR OTHER MEDICINES OR MEDICAL ATTENDANCE.

THE MOMENT RADWAY'S READY RELIEF IS APPLIED TO THE PATIENT—OR TAKEN INTERNALLY ACCORDING TO DIRECTIONS—PAIN, FROM WHATEVER CAUSE, CEASES TO EXISTS.

In all cases where pain or discomfort is experienced, or if seized with Influenza, Diphtheria, Sore Throat, Bad Colds, Coughs, Bilious Colic, Inflammation of the Bowels, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, or any other Cramp, Quinsy, Fever and Ague, or with Neuralgia, Headache, Toothache, Sciatica, Sciatica, Earache, or with Lumbago, Pain in the Back, or Rheumatism, or with Diarrhœa, Cholera Morbus, or Dysentery, or with Spasms, Colic, or Bruises, or with Spraining, Cramps, or Sprains, the application of RADWAY'S READY RELIEF will cure pain of the worst of these complaints in a few hours.

FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Dr. Radway's Regulating Pills

Perfectly tasteless, elegantly coated, for the cure of all disorders of the stomach, liver, bowels, kidneys, bladder, nervous diseases, headache, constipation, costiveness, indigestion, dyspepsia, biliousness, bilious fever, inflammation of the bowels, piles, and all derangements of the internal viscera. Warranted to effect a positive cure.

Price 25 cents per box. Sold by Druggists.

DR. RADWAY & CO.

32 Warren Street, New York.

E. F. KUNKEL'S BITTERWINE of IRON

E. F. Kunkel's celebrated Bitter Wine of Iron will effectually cure liver complaint, indigestion, dyspepsia, sick headache, debility, general ill health, diseases of the kidneys, and all diseases arising from a disordered liver, stomach or constipation, such as costiveness, flatulency, inward piles, fullness of blood to the head, acidity of the stomach, nausea, heartburn, disgust of food, fullness of weight in the stomach, sour eructations, sudden flushes of heat, burning in the flesh, nervous anxiety of the head, hurried or difficult breathing, flutering at the heart, choking or suffocating sensations when in a lying position, dimness of vision, dots or webs before the sight, fever, with dull pain in the head, deficiency of perspiration, yellowness of the skin and eyes, pain in the side, back, chest, limbs, and sudden flushes of heat, burning in the flesh, constant tiredness, and great depression of spirits can be effectually removed by the use of this medicine. Do not let your druggist palm off some other preparation in place of this, on the plea that it is just as good. It is not. Buy no other Wine of Iron. Take no other. Kunkel's Bitter Wine of Iron is put up in quart bottles, $1 a bottle. E. F. Kunkel, Proprietor, No. 29 North Ninth street, Philadelphia.

Sold by all druggists and druggists everywhere.

Tape Worm in Human Beings.

Head and all complete in two hours. No fee till head passes. Best Pills and Nonpareil Worms removed by Dr. Kinsman, 389 Spring Garden, Philadelphia, Pa. Send for circular. For remaining tape, Pin or Round Worms, call on or send for Dr. Kinsman's Vermifuge. Price $1 per bottle. Kinsman's Worm Syrup (pleasant). It never fails. Contains no opium, calomel, nor any thing injurious. Agents wanted in every place. Terms and circulars free. Address DR. J. SKINNER & CO., 38 Chestnut St., Phila.

THE NEW YORK EVENING POST.

IN ITS 76th YEAR.

Weekly Post.

These terms include the postage.

SINGLE COPY, one year . . . $1 50
Clubs of TEN or more, one year 1 25 each.
" TWENTY " " 1 10 "

Semi-Weekly Post.

These terms, except to subscribers in New York City, include the postage.

SINGLE COPY, one year . . . $6 00
Clubs of FIVE or more, one year 2 50 each.
" TEN " " 2 20 "

The Weekly and the Semi-Weekly give careful selections from the columns of the Daily paper, combined with original matter prepared expressly for them.

They contain a full record of current events, supplemented by intelligent and impartial criticisms. Special attention is invited to the Agricultural Department of these two journals.

CLUB AGENTS

may secure a really valuable article, from a Great Publication for a Pennies, or earn a liberal cash premium, with little exertion. Send for a copy of the great offer of made to those who solicit subscriptions for the EVENING POST.

FIFTY PREMIUMS

ANY PERSON

may obtain one of these premiums at less cost than it can be obtained WITHOUT the paper, by becoming a subscriber to the EVENING POST.

SPECIMEN NUMBERS SENT FREE. Send for List of Premiums.

Address

WM. C. BRYANT &CO., Publishers.

BROADWAY AND FULTON ST., NEW YORK.

ROYAL FRAGRANCE. Best Perfume in the Empire. Perfume in Solid Form. Send for 25 c. Sample. Free sample for 3 cents. Footage stamps. Wholesale Agents wanted. Address Chemist 6 North Kentucky street, Boston, Mass.

THE INDEPENDENT FOR 1877.

In addition to all the former excellences, it enters the approaching year with the prestige of being the most popular religious weekly newspaper in the world. It will offer as usual:

ENTIRELY NEW FEATURES,

of great importance and value.

FIRST—We shall offer through the year Sermons by the most eminent divines of the country, of all denominations, in the Monday Editorial. Our readers will, therefore, have the pleasure of hearing the best Sermons delivered in New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, Washington, etc.

SECOND—We shall publish a series of articles on CHRISTIAN WORK, by Dwight L. Moody, Mrs. Duffield, D. W. Bowen, and other well-known workers in the Christian vineyard, under the general heading, "Christian Work and Workers."

THIRD—A new feature, which we think will be found above the average of interest. The first of it will be in 12 or 15 letters, New Providence, N. Nashville, Tenn., Cincinnati, Ohio, Chicago, Ill., Lawrence, Kansas, and other places, will be described in a series of letters, by a gentleman who has recently visited them, for the purpose of ascertaining the best place for a Christian colony to settle in, and the best way of founding a Christian city. Among these are

A PAPER CITY,

THE WORKS OF CHARLES DICKENS,

which will be published in the INDEPENDENT, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday

THE FASHIONS.

There is quite a fancy abroad for harmony in costumes for the street, that is, especially in winter materials. Cloths and tweeds of cloth trimmed with fur are generally accompanied by the toque or turban, of the same material bordered with a band of similar fur.

FOR THE SEA LADIES.

The chinchilla fur is given a marked preference over all others, unless, indeed, we except the ever popular and rich-looking seal fur. This last has the additional merit of being a very durable article, superior in that respect to the lighter, less substantial chinchilla. In sacques there is a predilection for longer and more closely-fitting ones—that is, to the fur sacques. The seal and astrachan fur sacques are trimmed with otter and minever, also tipped seal fur and otter bands. The globe bands, accompanied by globe and seal fur turban and muff with short cuff or boa for the neck, are very handsome, but are objectionable to many people, on account of the power which is used in preparing them, and which exudes from the feathers. In astrachan fur, the white and black combined, are again popular for young people. Nothing can be more styling for little girls than turbans of white astrachan fur, bordered with black and having sacques and muffs to correspond.

Boas, however pretty, are now conceded to be unhealthy, and in their stead are used the pretty neckerchiefs of silk or velvet soft-silk braid, or for grown persons scarfs of lace, either Guipure or Spanish lace; or in many instances, fine tulle, edged with white silk fringe.

In this last mentioned article, many pretty scarfs and neckties are made. Some are of a triangular shape, which are wrought on the edges in scallops, formed by a running stitch of white silk floss. Others are a scarf form, have tiny stars bordering the edge, done in white floss, alternated with black or colored.

IN DRESS DRAPERY,

the tendency is still towards a diagonal one directly in the back, extending down some eight or ten inches below the bell. All longing is done below this fat portion.

The pelerine continues a favorite—many being buttoned in the back, and so many closed in front with two or three rows of small sized buttons. We have seen a very pretty continuous dress of Prince Bismarck, and a darker shade of green silk. The dressmaker was a mixture of silk and wool, and had an arabesque pattern of leaves and trailing vines upon it. The pelerine was in a lighter shade than the ground. The underskirt had first a box plaited flounce of silk upon it, and above that a wide plaited flounce of dressmaker. On every second box plait of the lower flounce was a small silk button. The overdress was a sleeveless princesse of the dressmaker goods, buttoned down the front with larger steel buttons that have lately been used for such garments. Very low down in front are three upturned pleats, each about two inches in depth. This drapery of silk and dress goods middle is continued somewhat higher up, nearer the central back width, which latter falls over the side drapery, drawn together under it, and presents a plain surface, plaited smoothly over the slight tournure. A long, graduated pocket of silk, lined with dressmaker, and having the central fold buttoned over, with buttons of a size to correspond with those upon the box plaited flounce on the bottom, was placed rather high up on the right side. A deep knotted fringe of mingled wool and chenille, edges the bottom of this garment, and a closely plaited ruff and bellarette of silk finished the neck. Similarly plaited cuffs trimmed the sleeves. This was a very elegant costume and one well worth copying in their colors and material. A silk able hat to wear with such a costume was made of green velvet, of a shade similar to the silk of the costume, and had a folded scarf of silk about it, a cock's feather plume, and a shaded wing.

For a little girl a pretty walking suit of brown and plaided brown cashmere was made, with a bib skirt of the plaided goods. That is the side and back widths were kilted, the front widths were cut diagonally, and box plaited down in front. The overdress was of paletot was of plain brown cashmere, and had sacque fronts. The side and back pieces were diagonally, to within thirteen inches of the hem, where they were cut off, and closely kilted skirts set on under the plaining curved edge of the diagonals part. Just where the joining seam was marked on each side each end of brown silk were set in a of tiny loosely sewn the back of the sleeves. Square pockets of cashmere, with pleated ruffles of silk below, were placed on each side of the front skirts, rather low down. Bows of brown ribbon are placed on the corners of each pocket flap. Little Gainsborough hat of brown felt, with bright wing and knot of ribbon under the rim where it is turned up. Muff of brown cloth edged with fox fur.

SHOES AND HOSE.

Striped stockings are no longer in style.

Adjustable pockets of black silk are worn, suspended by either straps of silk or silk cords and tassels.

The close fitting capote bonnet is preferred by many of the leaders of fashion to the coquettish Gainsborough hat, which is so generally adopted and it has lost prestige.

Deep circular wraps, with a plain hood, having a knot or ribbon, and long loops and ends pendant therefrom, are very much worn by fashionable people.

Thanks are due Messrs. Horner & Cuttody for information received.

OUR WORK TABLE.

We will give information this week concerning the making of a Letter and Note Case. Materials required are three-quarters of a yard of silver perforated card-board, the same quantity of dark brown shaded brown cambric, for embroidering, a small quantity of yellow chenille, and also some shaded rose color and green. Some blue silk or satin ribbon an inch and a half wide, two pieces of chenille cord, mingled blue and silver, or blue and white. The shape of the case is oval with the lower end pointed. Those are three compartments, one for letters, one for labels, and replied to, and having the word "Unanswered" wrought upon its surface, in blue chenille. The second one just below is has "Answered" wrought in a similar manner upon it. The third or lower flap near the pointed end has "Notes," or if French be preferred, "Billets" upon it. Just for foundation, cut from thin cardboard an oval piece of fourteen inches in length, and twelve broad at its widest part. Over the front with blue silk, and the back with perforated board. Lay on the silk in tiny, longitudinal folds. For the first pocket or flap, cut a piece from the perforated board, rounded, or partly oval at the top, that will be about four inches or four and a half in depth, and of a width and shape across to fit neatly over that part of the back which it is designed to be placed over. Line it with blue silk. Bind the upper and side edges with narrow blue ribbon. Work in German letters "Unanswered" on the centre. At each side a tiny cluster of rosebuds in shaded rose-colored chenille, and a sprig of forgetmenots in pale blue with yellow centres, the leaves in shaded green. Place it five or six inches from the top of the back piece. Arrange the second flap in a similar manner, letting the upper part cover the bottom of the first flap. Work "Answered" and similar cluster of flowers upon it. Work "Notes" or "Billets" upon the lower flap, which must cover the bottom of the back piece, and also the lower edges of the second flap. Cover the edges with a ruching or quilling of the inch and a half ribbon. Place a ribbon loop at the top to hang it by. Put a row of the chenille cord down the centre of the ribbon quilling. Put loops of chenille at the edges of the different flaps, and at the lower edge of the note pocket.

BIRDIE.

FAIR ADALINE OF ARD.

BY CHARLES S. LAUNEY.

In the soft gold rays of a Finland morn
As they glimmered the town and bay,
Fair Adaline of Ard Moore
Loosed out for a ship on the sea.

And the cheeks were flying from the Flower
From the land of the icy pole;
And the sun grew dim and dark on the sand,
As the sun sinked behind.

At last! at last! a sail she knew,
To once but laugh at its leaving—
Knowing she would be back in a month or two
Yet drove him 'way deeming!

And the winds wailed loud, and the winds
wailed low
To chill her heart with fear
While she knelt on the beach in her pitiful woe
With a love which she said to the air

In the rosy rays 'neath a morning sky
There was washed, with a wreck on the shore,
A Sightsired lad who'd loved as a boy,
Yet knew not she loved him more!

And the winds of the pole were sorry they did
Fair Adaline of Ard Moore
Who clung to her lover wet and dead,
To tell what to heaven was known!

FRED'S FUNERALS.

FROM A LADY'S DEAD BOOK.

"Yes, aunt, you must excuse me."

"But Fred."

"There are no buts about it, my dear aunt. I cannot and will not be taken down to the drawing-room to-night."

"Then I shall certainly be compelled to excuse you," I replied, striving to keep back the tears which some way would fill my eyes every time I attempted to reason with the noble fellow lying so helpless before me.

Months before the opening of this story, Fred Travers, in attempting to mend a scaffolding raised upon a building of which he was the architect, was precipitated to the floor, the scaffolding upon his feet. The effect was partial paralysis to the lower limbs. Everything that medical skill could suggest was promptly attended to, but with very little success; and the poor fellow had about decided that he must remain a helpless cripple the rest of his life. I shall never forget the day he resigned himself to his fate. Every comfort that his fancy was regulated to keep out of his room until he signified his desire to be visited.

About eight o'clock in the evening I was unexpected by Fred's nurse.

"Well," said I, having his outstretched hand, "what is it?"

"Oh, nothing aunt; only I have had a funeral, and I am stranger, part of all is, I was chief mourner. I have buried all my youthful hopes and aspirations; and henceforth there will be no more swivelling over the 'inevitable.'"

Since my nephew's accident, I had not held my usual Wednesday evening receptions; but he was now so far recovered that I thought it best to begin again. All my attempts to have him make one of the party were useless. He saw that I was grieved, and said, while a bitter smile played round his handsome mouth, "It would be a pretty sight, now, wouldn't it, to see me, a great strapping fellow, six feet in my stockings, carried by a footman down into the parlor?"

"But, Fred, ben can take you down before anyone comes. And all my friends know that I never entertain company after eleven; so you will not become tired of sitting."

There was the least perceptible quiver about the finely chiselled mouth, as he replied, "My dear, precious little aunt, don't you see that I am not yet able to conquer the mortification this helplessness entails upon me? I shall be obliged to have those other funeral. Then, perhaps, I can become all you would have me. I shall lie on the sofa in the library," he added. "You can leave the door open, so that the strains of music can float up to me; and I shall enjoy myself quite as much as if one of the crowd. If you were not my aunt, I should fall in love with you to-night," as I leaned over and kissed his forehead.

How glad I was that he had so far escaped the contagion of real love; for well I knew that, with his extremely positive temperament, he would consider it his first duty to free the woman of his choice, as expeditiously as possible, and that would be the most heart-rending thing of all.

I don't know why I was unable to keep my thoughts with the company assembled; but they would stray off up-stairs, and several times I caught myself whispering, "Poor Fred! Poor Fred! More than one inquiry was made for him, for he was a favorite with us all—but to no one did I say, "Go up-stairs." I knew he did not wish it.

The belle of the evening was a Miss Griffin, an intimate friend of one of my boarding-school cousins, but a stranger to me. She sang exquisitely, played with a skill truly professional, conversed intelligently and intelligibly; and these latter accomplishments were so rare among young ladies generally, that I found myself quite attracted to her. Some one volunteered to play a waltz, and as the young folks flew round to the fascinating strains of Strauss, I ran up-stairs to see how Fred was enjoying himself. The gas was turned quite low, but the grate sent out a cheerful light which illuminated the corner of the room, leaving the sofa and corners in deep shadow.

What a sight met my eyes.

Miss Griffin, supposing herself the sole occupant of the room, had taken a seat upon the hearth, resting her head against Fred's quaint little head bent on one side, canary-fashion, she sat muttering to herself. I stopped and listened; I couldn't help it so sure my life.

"Why, isn't this jolly! This seems homelike. I don't believe I like parties. Oh! I forgot; my heart hurt me. That's my excuse. I shall be obliged to have those waltz. I wonder what dreadful creature first conceived the idea of waltzing? If I had my way he should hop through all ages, and on one foot! Bright! a nice fire! how cheerful! Our library used to be something like this before papa died. Oh, dear! There isn't a bit of happiness in the world unless one has somebody to love one?" and then I knew the little creature was sobbing.

Now that was too bad. What could I do? Nothing evidently. What would Fred do? Keep very quiet, and allow her to depart in total ignorance of his presence? I felt that this little episode would leave a deep and lasting impression, if, who knew Fred so thoroughly, perfectly understood.

How much pleasanter to spend an evening here than with all those stupid folks down stairs" and the little one some from her low seat, and began a survey of the apartment. I knew it was all up then. In a second more, a smothered shriek, a quick "I beg pardon, sir; I thought I was alone" was waited to my ears.

"You are perfectly excusable, my dear young lady."

Fred evidently intended to play the paternal can omera.

"Please do not feel distressed about it. I should have spoke when you first entered, but I foolishly imagined you would be able to leave without observing me. If it does not make you feel annoyed, I shall be very glad it has happened, as it has afforded me a glimpse of something natural and spontaneous."

I knew it was wrong to stop there listening, but I was actually riveted to the spot. Women always have some excuse for prying; and "riveted" is as good as any for me.

"Are you ill, sir?" she inquired, drawing a little nearer.

"Not very," he replied; "although probably an invalid for life."

"The end of this episode is not yet, though I, and I was right.

"My name is Miss Griffin—Margaret Griffin. Most everybody calls me Maggie," she went on by way of introduction.

"And my name is Travers—Frederick Travers. Most everybody calls me Fred," replied her companion; but I know by the tone of my nephew's voice that, for the moment, he had ceased to think of himself and his infirmity. "I am Mrs. Andrews' nephew, at your service."

"Let us be friends," she said sweetly; and I knew then, just as well as I know now, that Maggie Griffin's hand lay in that of the invalid.

"I don't want to say I am sorry for you," she continued, "because I think there are few who like to be pitied. It don't seem to me that I should like to be about walking; that is, if I had plenty of money, and somebody to care for me, and lots of books."

But the tremulant in the girl's voice betrayed her, and the next moment she was sobbing convulsively. Quick steps ascended the stairs, and I moved away from the threshold very much like a person caught in the act of listening. What occurred subsequently I did not know until some time after. I tried to conceal my abstraction and appear as usual, and was somewhat relieved when, a few minutes after, Miss Griffin took her leave. Of what I talked with a brilliant sweep of her little fingers commenced the "Laughing Song." How she did laugh, and how she did sing! For a week after, the office of these heartbreaking strains seemed to most me in the far corners of the house, and only ten minutes before she was sobbing as if her heart would break.

"I never heard Maggie sing so well," observed a lady friend.

"She really excels herself."

Didn't I know that she was singing for Fred? Didn't I know that her voice was laden with love, and heavily laden too? The poor child had not yet begun to feel its weight.

"Heaven help her," I said softly to myself.

"How did you like the singing, Fred?" I asked the next morning, at breakfast.

"It was delightful. Of all the contraltos I ever heard, she is the sweetest. But who was the fair vocalist?—for of course she is fair."

"A stranger, Fred," I answered carelessly, glancing at his handsome face. "A Miss Griffin—Maggie Griffin, I believe they call her."

His face was like that of an angel for a moment, a shadow of dissatisfaction was depicted upon every lineament; but it gradually faded, and the old patient, sombre look resumed its place. Not another word was spoken.

For the next two months Fred received many tiny perfumed notes, and I noticed that then (the footman) made trips to the post-office more frequently than formerly. In the meantime I had met the young lady on several occasions, and we had become very good friends; but I kept my own counsel. I noticed that for several days Fred had looked exceedingly sad and careworn; my first thought was not to remark upon it; but when I saw the quiver of the poor fellow's lip, I could keep silent no longer.

"Well, dear, what is it?" I asked again.

"Oh, aunt, I have been trying to have another funeral, but the body refuses to be buried. I dug the grave, but the rest is beyond me."

"It seems to me, Fred, that if I were in your place, I should not be desirous of taking on myself the duties of a professional undertaker. Whether you can walk again or not, you have probably a long life before you; and my advice is, to allow all the plants which Providence in its goodness sends to your garden—for some unknown reason, called by the fashionable—to blossom and bear fruit. Throw nothing away which is holy, and calculated to lessen your burden."

"Aunt, what do you mean?" he exclaimed. Just then Ben stuck his head in the door.

"Miss Griffin wishes to see Mrs. Andrews and Mr. Travers immediately."

"Good gracious!" exclaimed Fred.

"Show her up, Ben," I ordered.

"But, aunt, not here. You don't—that is—I never, you see——"

But the sudden entrance of the young lady put an end to all indecision.

"I am so glad to find you both together!" she exclaimed, walking straight to the side of Fred's chair. "This letter will explain why I am here. Allow me to read it."

"Tyson and Tyson!" inquired Fred, recognizing his own chirography.

"Very well, then," said she, folding the note. "But, Mrs. Andrews, your nephew must I have corresponded for the sake of a love him, and he loves me. This morning I received this cruel note. He has irrevocably determined, he says, not to allow this love to go on another day—that he will not be a burden to me, that he will outlast. Who ever heard of such cruel nonsense? As if he had it in his power to put an end to my love, or his own either?" and her eyes filled with tears.

"Oh, Maggie!" whispered Fred, looking steadfastly out of the window; you don't know what you are talking about."

"Yes, I do, Fred," she said, sweetly. If we were poor it would make a difference, I suppose; and yet I scarcely think it could. You are rich, and so am I. And, Fred Travers, you will walk again. I know it. Don't I believe Heaven itself has whispered that in my ear. If you don't love me, say so, and I will go away and never trouble you again."

"Heaven bless you, darling! I love you more than myself a thousand times over. You shall stay." That's what Fred said.

What did I do? Looked on a moment at the little figure nestling beside my nephew's chair, while he laid his hands gently on the curly head, thanking Heaven, I know, for the blessings of his life, walked out to my own room, and had a good cry, woman fashion.

Two years have passed since then, and Fred walks now as well as any one.

EXPANDING THE LUNGS.

Step out into the forest air you can find, straight-pretty erect, with head and shoulders back, and then fixing the lips as if you were going to whistle, draw the air through the lips into the lungs. When the chest is about full, gradually raise the arms, keeping them extended with the palms of the hands down, as you suck in the air, so as to bring them over the head just as the lungs are quite full. Then drop the thumbs inward, and, keeping the arms backward and the chest open, reverse the process by which you draw your breath, till the lungs are empty. This process should be repeated immediately after bathing, and several times during the day. It is impossible to describe to one who has never tried it, the glorious sense of vigor which follows this exercise. It is the best experiment in the world.

THE LOST JEWEL.

During the Indian Mutiny, and after the destruction of many of the rich palaces and temples, the soldiers picked up many valuable articles, useless to themselves, and which they frequently threw away again, as troublesome to carry; or gladly sold to any one who would give them a few rupees in exchange. Among these acquisitions was a large, very roughly cut diamond, which had been one of the eyes of a gorgeously painted idol, cushioned in one of the temples that had been destroyed. A soldier picked it out of its socket, and as it was a rough, dull-looking stone, he thought very little of it, and was just going to throw it away, when an officer who stood by offered him two or three rupees for it. He also put last small stone by his purchase of the lustreless stone; and it was only from the curiosity of an idol that he judged it might possibly be of greater value than seemed likely from its outward appearance. Some time afterward he showed it to a native jeweler, who offered to give him all the rings, and somewhat increase on the price he had given for it; but he was going to England, and thought it wiser to take the stone with him, and have it properly cut by a first-class jeweler. This was done, and a very fine stone resulted; which the jeweler, at the most modest calculation, valued at five hundred pounds. Instead of the gold in ring, and wore it for several years quite safely, but one day chancing to be in London, he went into a shop to buy a pair of gloves, and looking at the ring on his little finger, he observed that the setting was quite loose. Immediately he examined his glove, his pockets, the floor of the shop; no trace of the stone was to be seen, and so he gave it up as lost. However, he mentioned it to the club at his club; and told the club-master to post up a notice offering ten pounds reward to any one who should find the diamond. A day or two afterwards the glove was brought to him. It had been found by one of the housemaids in a darkish passage that led to the billiard room. The reward was gladly paid, and the diamond; and to the jewel's, to be once more firmly placed in the ring.

Again some years passed. The officer had been to India, and was on a furlough in England, and had gone to Scotland to shoot with friends who had taken a moor in the Highlands. One hot August day he had been out for several hours tramping over miles of close heather, grouse-shooting. He was still walking, when a cover of birds rose a little way off. He raised his gun to take aim, when his eye chanced to fall on his ring, and he saw that the setting was more empty. Stopping to look at it, the birds got away; and he laid down the gun on the heather beside him, and carefully examined the place where he had seen a very feeble hope of finding the glittering stone. Nothing was to be seen of it; and when he recollected the many miles he had traversed that day, and the nature of the ground he had been on, he thought it was like the proverbial needle in a bottle of hay. Another visit to the jeweler, and the ring resumed its place on the finger of its owner, and three or four years passed away. The officer had again returned to India, and was with his regiment, which was encamped near a large station, portions of some other regiments being close to them. He was acting as adjutant to the general in command, and was writing at a small table placed close to the door of his tent. As his hand passed rapidly over the paper, the troublesome diamond once more dropped from its setting, and fell on the table beside him. Being in a hurry, he merely uttered an energetic exclamation, pushed the stone close to the inkstand, and went on with his writing. Presently a messenger came to say that the General wished to see him immediately. He put aside the stone, threw on his uniform, buckled on his sword, and started at once for the quarters of the commanding officer. He was detained some little time; and when he reentered his tent, he looked directly for the diamond, which he had meanwhile recollected; but it was gone! A thief had been there during his absence, had seen and appropriated the stone, and he never saw or heard of it again, though he offered a liberal reward for its restoration.

TRANSFUSION OF BLOOD.

Truly science has, as was said recently by one of its eminent votaries, "its romantic side." Its history presents not a few deeds of heroism and self-sacrifice; its results have not seldom been attained by suffering patiently inflicted, and have now and then cost the lives of willing victims. The young Berlin doctor who, when a deadly contagious disease was ravaging the poorer tenements of that city, thought he had discovered a method for its cure, and, knowing that its test might be fatal, nevertheless boldly tried it upon himself, and who, as he lay dying from the effects, noted down his observations of its action on his system until within nine minutes of his departure from earth, was a hero to whom Sir Philip Sidney would have felt kinship. The act was scarcely heroic, or sublime, as is involved serious self-sacrifice, has just been done at Manchester by a young English medical student. It appears that a would-be suicide, who had long annoyed all the hospital, which made him so feeble that he was not likely to recover. He was first stinking when the hospital doctor declared that there was but one possible way of saving his life, namely, the patient's languid veins must be transfused a quantity of warm blood from a vigorous, living man. A young student, who heard this, at once stepped forward and offered his own blood for the purpose. A pint of the vital fluid was thereupon taken from him, and sent circulating through the arm and body of the moribund youth. Within two hours he revived, recognized people, and was pronounced on the way to recovery.

The young medical student to whose unselfish heroism this good result was due may possibly have worked harder than he knew. It was long a matter of discussion and doubt whether this operation of transfusion could really be performed so as to transfer the vital vigor of one person to another. It is not at all a new idea, indeed, for we read of its having been tried on a certain pope four centuries ago, three young men being compelled to sacrifice their lives in order that the Pontiff might thus renew his youth; but the experiment failed. The experiment has been tried many times, and in different countries; and for the past half century the practicability of transfusion has been generally admitted by the profession. The difficulty is, to successfully effect it; but it is well known that the blood of animals has been again and again transfused to the veins of human beings with the best physical results.

Of course the idea of transfusion gives rise to many romantic fancies. Can you make an old man young, a cross man amiable, a coward brave, a nervous man phlegmatic, by exchanging the vital fluid in his veins? In there a modification of Asher truth in Edmund About's funny conceit about the "tone of a notary?" The blood of lambs is sometimes used in the operation of transfusion; do the doctors find the patients thereafter more lamb-like? How gratifying it would be if, by merely virtueting the gentle denizen of the pasture, and transfusing its blood to mental veins, we could transform the uncomfortable temperm around us into perennial docility! We fear, however, that psychological results are not to be attained by this very material process. Very much will be gained by trying if we can restore ruddiness to pallid cheeks, and strength to a tottering body; if we can see the consumptive revive under the clever transfusion of blood yielded to him by the self-sacrifice of another, as the fainting vampire revived under the moon's rays; and if the effects of those horrible sudden hemorrhages which end in abrupt death from some hard-to-find wound be obviated by a prompt transfusion. It may not be that the fountain of perpetual youth is to be found welling up from the heart of one's neighbor; that the gift of health from one mortal body to another has a certain poetry about it scarcely less pleasing to the fancy than the ancient fable, being significant of human self-sacrifice, a noble emotion to which the ancient fable was wanting.—Appleton's Journal.

TIGHT LACING

It is a trite but correct remark, that, as the human form has been moulded by nature, the best shape is undoubtedly that which she has given it. To endeavor to render it more graceful by artificial means is to change it; to make it much smaller below, and much larger above, is to destroy its beauty; to keep it cased up in a kind of dungeon, is not only to deform it, but to expose the internal parts to serious injury. Under such compression as is commonly practised by ladies, the development of the lungs, which are still tender, does not take place conformably to the intention of nature, because nutrition is necessarily stopped, and they consequently become stunted and diseased. Those who wear these appliances of tight lacing often complain that they cannot sit upright without them—are sometimes, indeed, compelled to wear them during sleep, and to change bone—a fact which proves to what an extent such articles weaken the muscles of the trunk. The injury does not fall merely on the internal structures of the body, but also on its beauty, and on the tender ties by which this beauty is associated. Beauty is in reality but another name for expression of countenance, which is the index of sound health, intelligence, good feelings, and peace of mind. All are aware that uneasy feelings, existing habitually in the breast, speedily exhibit their signature in the countenance, and that bitter thoughts or a bad temper spoil the human expression of its comeliness and grace.

HOW TO BEGIN THE DAY.

Rise with the lark, but not for one. Be very careful to attire yourself neatly; ourselves, like our salads, are always the better for a good dressing. Shave unmistakably before breakfast; cold water and chains, like oysters, should have their beards taken off before being permitted to go down. Start with a determination to be agreeable and good-tempered, and that like an overflowing fire, nothing shall put you out. Should the tea be hot, take it cooly; should the ham be salt, emulate the philosophic Bacon, and having made a fire pleasant, with directions about the milk of human kindness, the sugar of domestic felicity, the cup of happiness being full, and the butter resembling an actor in a fresh part, because it appears for the first time, sing the appropriate ballad of "Let the toast pass," cracking fresh eggs and stale jokes simultaneously.

CORRESPONDENCE.

M. W. N.—If a person passes through the nose naturally, we do not think the fault can be avoided.

LOVER.—The president, direct and honorable course is always to apply in the proper quarter for permission to pay love addresses to their daughter.

A. E. F. M.—The theory of "perpetual motion" is an impossibility. There can be no such thing as a machine that will go forever, because it must sooner or later wear itself out by friction.

W. Y.—There are no particular instructions that can be given in respect to mixing water-colors; you should take lessons of a drawing-master. Inventionary blushing arises from nervousness.

C. T.—We do not undertake to give opinions on pieces of poetry that are sent us. An editor could not possibly undertake a more invidious task. It is a very delicate thing from giving an opinion on handwriting.

A LOVER OF THE POST.—There is no secret of the kind. The video of the eyes is easier for the complexion; you may procure it of any respectable chemist's. We do not undertake to give opinions on the color of locks of hair.

F. C. A.—As an ordinary rule persons inclined to be stout are more healthy than those who are thin. But this is not always the case. As to your second question, we think it evidently suffering from nervousness, and should consult a medical practitioner.

ARRIE P.—An apprentice cannot absent himself from the service of his master with out the consent of the said master, and for so doing he may be compelled to return to his trade, and should he refuse to return he his liable to be sent to the house of correction.

THOMAS L.—Having been introduced to the young lady on whose account you are suffering so much, you should call upon her whenever you have an opportunity, and take occasion to learn your fate. You certainly seem to be in a desperately bad way now.

N. A.—The smallest bird of America is the humming-bird, and of Europe the gold-crested wren. The smallest quadruped in the world is the pigmy mouse of Siberia. The most diminutive plant is the arctic raspberry, which is so small that a six-ounce weight will hold the whole, branches, leaves and all.

A. W. L.—Your definitions of the comparative and superlative degrees are quite correct. If there be but two parts to compare, you never say that one was stronger than the other otherwise, "This is the sweeter of the two." If there be three or more, then you would say, "This is the sweetest."

WALTER W.—If your father's reproach were unjustly made, you should forbear to be sorry for your impertinence. Sorrow is wasted if it is permissible for a father to make a mistake in the exercise of his paternal authority, but a son's error in perpetrating an act of disobedience only aggravates the fundamental offence.

ELSIE C. GRAHAM.—Those who wear glasses less dependence on the color of the hair and eyes of an admirer in deciding as to receiving his attentions, than on the knowledge of his character as shown by his habits. It is runned by no great a risk to receive attentions from any gentleman however attractive without such acquaintance.

WILSON BEYER, (AKRON, O.)—Publishers of Music will accept any piece of fair merit, provided the author will agree to purchase a sufficient number of copies. Publishers also allow him copyright on the remaining numbers which may be sold. You can correspond with White, Smith & Co., Boston, or S. T. Gordon & Bro., New York, who are reliable publishers.

GEO. WILLARD, (Windham, O.)—The prediction of the weather by "Old Probabilities" at Washington, is rendered easy to an expert in meteorology by the telegraphic and only transmitted from Stations all over the country. The effect of a storm and the direction and velocity in which it is moving being known it is not difficult to calculate where it will be in a given number of hours.

ALICE.—As jealousy is called the "green-eyed monster," it may be that that was the origin of assigning the same epithet to the passion jealousy. But as the origin of such things is almost always lost in antiquity, people must be liberal in their belief with regard to such matters, and not bring a censorious spirit of critical investigation to bear upon them, to the great discomfort of warm-hearted young ladies.

CONTRITE.—It is fortunate that you awoke in time to the dangers of the path which you were so heedlessly pursuing, and it is not to be regarded that you now find yourself in the valley of humiliation. You should remember, however, that two roads lead even from that gloomy vale, one of them running straight up the steep side of sin, and the other leading downward by devious courses to the pit of destruction.

ALBERT MAIS, (Princess Anne, Md.—A gentleman calling at a house where there are several young ladies should inquire at the door for the one or more he wishes to see, and send in his card. If he has no cards let him give his name. Cards are not customarily in the country or in town, but they are fashionable, and should be used as a guard against mistakes. Your handwriting is fair, but improvement is needed in the capitals and the lower letters.

W. R. M., (Aurelia, Iowa.)—The titles of stories should be printed in capitals; the writers initials which words are to be capitals by drawing lines under them, two lines for small capitals. Undertakers are those who get up funerals in every variety; cremationists, embalmers, vault makers and grave diggers all have their say in its columns, while the makers of humble tombstones and the sculptors of more monumental ones are ready to decorate the last home of man. Crape makers, manufacturers of all sorts of funeral appliances, and especially mourning material manufacturers, call attention of the afflicted in their special advertisement. Wills of distinguished individuals are given, and lost wills advertised; the cards of attorneys drilled in probate matters, and advertisements for absent heirs, make up a portion of its patronage. The reading matter is all suited to the subject, while the obituary notices form a staple item, and, if necessary, choice music is furnished by distinguished writers for the afflicted friends and relations of deceased persons.

SCIENTIFIC.

THE lowest temperature in the Arctic zone recorded by Captain Ross in 1850 was 36 degrees below zero; by Dr. Kane in 1853, 39 degrees; by Dr Hayes in 1861, 69 degrees; by Captain Nares in 1876, 72 degrees; and by Lieutenant Greely in 1882, 74 degrees. The highest temperature ever registered was 72 degrees at Yakoutsk, Siberia.

It is said that, according to calculations recently made, the planet Jupiter is still hot, and yet the eight centuries to come. M. Grunes calculated that the maximum production of heat emanated from Jupiter 800,000 years ago, has now reached its minimum, and he assumes that there is enough heat to last for 800,000 of time, which may remove a great weight from the minds of those who are already wondering where their coal was coming from for next winter.

SIR JOSEPH WHITWORTH states that in 1870 he for the first time proved that a ship could be penetrated below the water line by a fluid-compressed cotton bale. In 1880, he penetrated for the first time a four-and-one-half inch armor plate with a twenty-pound fluid shell, which exploded in an oak backsupporting the plate. In 1882, he penetrated with a four-inch bare gun, three five-inch armor plates, interlaminated with two five-inch layers of iron, reduced in 1883, with his new nine-pounder breech-loading gun and a three-inch armor plate, he penetrated a three-inch armor plate at an angle of forty-five degrees. All these performances with one exception, were made with flat-headed projectiles.

A VALUABLE method of recovering indigo, cochineal, madder, and other coloring substances from wool or woolen fabrics is described in the Mon. Sci. Quesneville. The article to be treated for this purpose are put into a digester, capable of resisting a very high pressure, and the whole is entirely dissolved. It requiring about six hours for 2,500 pounds, and when the solution is complete, water is added and boiled for a few minutes, to reduce the more fluid. It is then strained through a coarse filter to separate the foreign substances, and through a second filter to separate the indigo, cochineal, madder, and other coloring matters. The others then obtained are washed with water and again filtered and dried. The solution that has thus passed through the filters is used either in the manufacture or given state of potash of sulphate of ammonia, etc.

M. W. N.—If a person passes through the nose naturally, we do not think the fault can be avoided.

LOVER.—The president, direct and honorable course is always to apply in the proper quarter for permission to pay love addresses to their daughter.

A. E. F. M.—The theory of "perpetual motion" is an impossibility. There can be no such thing as a machine that will go forever, because it must sooner or later wear itself out by friction.

W. Y.—There are no particular instructions that can be given in respect to mixing water-colors; you should take lessons of a drawing-master. Inventionary blushing arises from nervousness.

C. T.—We do not undertake to give opinions on pieces of poetry that are sent us. An editor could not possibly undertake a more invidious task. It is a very delicate thing from giving an opinion on handwriting.

A LOVER OF THE POST.—There is no secret of the kind. The video of the eyes is easier for the complexion; you may procure it of any respectable chemist's. We do not undertake to give opinions on the color of locks of hair.

F. C. A.—As an ordinary rule persons inclined to be stout are more healthy than those who are thin. But this is not always the case. As to your second question, we think it evidently suffering from nervousness, and should consult a medical practitioner.

ARRIE P.—An apprentice cannot absent himself from the service of his master with out the consent of the said master, and for so doing he may be compelled to return to his trade, and should he refuse to return he his liable to be sent to the house of correction.

THOMAS L.—Having been introduced to the young lady on whose account you are suffering so much, you should call upon her whenever you have an opportunity, and take occasion to learn your fate. You certainly seem to be in a desperately bad way now.

N. A.—The smallest bird of America is the humming-bird, and of Europe the gold-crested wren. The smallest quadruped in the world is the pigmy mouse of Siberia. The most diminutive plant is the arctic raspberry, which is so small that a six-ounce weight will hold the whole, branches, leaves and all.

A. W. L.—Your definitions of the comparative and superlative degrees are quite correct. If there be but two parts to compare, you never say that one was stronger than the other otherwise, "This is the sweeter of the two." If there be three or more, then you would say, "This is the sweetest."

WALTER W.—If your father's reproach were unjustly made, you should forbear to be sorry for your impertinence. Sorrow is wasted if it is permissible for a father to make a mistake in the exercise of his paternal authority, but a son's error in perpetrating an act of disobedience only aggravates the fundamental offence.

ELSIE C. GRAHAM.—Those who wear glasses less dependence on the color of the hair and eyes of an admirer in deciding as to receiving his attentions, than on the knowledge of his character as shown by his habits. It is runned by no great a risk to receive attentions from any gentleman however attractive without such acquaintance.

WILSON BEYER, (AKRON, O.)—Publishers of Music will accept any piece of fair merit, provided the author will agree to purchase a sufficient number of copies. Publishers also allow him copyright on the remaining numbers which may be sold. You can correspond with White, Smith & Co., Boston, or S. T. Gordon & Bro., New York, who are reliable publishers.

GEO. WILLARD, (Windham, O.)—The prediction of the weather by "Old Probabilities" at Washington, is rendered easy to an expert in meteorology by the telegraphic and only transmitted from Stations all over the country. The effect of a storm and the direction and velocity in which it is moving being known it is not difficult to calculate where it will be in a given number of hours.

ALICE.—As jealousy is called the "green-eyed monster," it may be that that was the origin of assigning the same epithet to the passion jealousy. But as the origin of such things is almost always lost in antiquity, people must be liberal in their belief with regard to such matters, and not bring a censorious spirit of critical investigation to bear upon them, to the great discomfort of warm-hearted young ladies.

CONTRITE.—It is fortunate that you awoke in time to the dangers of the path which you were so heedlessly pursuing, and it is not to be regarded that you now find yourself in the valley of humiliation. You should remember, however, that two roads lead even from that gloomy vale, one of them running straight up the steep side of sin, and the other leading downward by devious courses to the pit of destruction.

ALBERT MAIS, (Princess Anne, Md.—A gentleman calling at a house where there are several young ladies should inquire at the door for the one or more he wishes to see, and send in his card. If he has no cards let him give his name. Cards are not customarily in the country or in town, but they are fashionable, and should be used as a guard against mistakes. Your handwriting is fair, but improvement is needed in the capitals and the lower letters.

W. R. M., (Aurelia, Iowa.)—The titles of stories should be printed in capitals; the writers initials which words are to be capitals by drawing lines under them, two lines for small capitals. Undertakers are those who get up funerals in every variety; cremationists, embalmers, vault makers and grave diggers all have their say in its columns, while the makers of humble tombstones and the sculptors of more monumental ones are ready to decorate the last home of man. Crape makers, manufacturers of all sorts of funeral appliances, and especially mourning material manufacturers, call attention of the afflicted in their special advertisement. Wills of distinguished individuals are given, and lost wills advertised; the cards of attorneys drilled in probate matters, and advertisements for absent heirs, make up a portion of its patronage. The reading matter is all suited to the subject, while the obituary notices form a staple item, and, if necessary, choice music is furnished by distinguished writers for the afflicted friends and relations of deceased persons.

SCIENTIFIC.

THE lowest temperature in the Arctic zone recorded by Captain Ross in 1850 was 36 degrees below zero; by Dr. Kane in 1853, 39 degrees; by Dr Hayes in 1861, 69 degrees; by Captain Nares in 1876, 72 degrees; and by Lieutenant Greely in 1882, 74 degrees. The highest temperature ever registered was 72 degrees at Yakoutsk, Siberia.

It is said that, according to calculations recently made, the planet Jupiter is still hot, and yet the eight centuries to come. M. Grunes calculated that the maximum production of heat emanated from Jupiter 800,000 years ago, has now reached its minimum, and he assumes that there is enough heat to last for 800,000 of time, which may remove a great weight from the minds of those who are already wondering where their coal was coming from for next winter.

SIR JOSEPH WHITWORTH states that in 1870 he for the first time proved that a ship could be penetrated below the water line by a fluid-compressed cotton bale. In 1880, he penetrated for the first time a four-and-one-half inch armor plate with a twenty-pound fluid shell, which exploded in an oak backsupporting the plate. In 1882, he penetrated with a four-inch bare gun, three five-inch armor plates, interlaminated with two five-inch layers of iron, reduced in 1883, with his new nine-pounder breech-loading gun and a three-inch armor plate, he penetrated a three-inch armor plate